As a minor canon, sacrist and precentor, Sargenson responded to Canterbury's need to replace repertory lost during the Civil War. He made efforts to obtain music, oversaw its copying and added his own compositions. His works are found in the earliest Restoration manuscripts at Canterbury, particularly additions to John Barnard's First Book of Selected Church Musick (London, 1641/R). His choice of texts, from the Sunday collects, for two of his three full anthems (GB-Lbl Add.30932) was not typical. A second version of his morning service in B♭, although no longer used at Canterbury, circulated widely in the late 17th and 18th centuries; it was in the repertories of several cathedrals in 1824 (see the Quarterly Musical Magazine and Review, vi (1824), 21–7, 310–17) and exists in many manuscripts. While this is notable for its sobriety and brevity rather than for its wealth of invention, the surviving anthems are attractive examples of a native cathedral style. Sargenson's other extant works (all incomplete) are an evening service in B♭, a Benedicite in D and two verse anthems.

ROBERT FORD

Sargent, Sir (Harold) Malcolm (Watts) (b Ashford, Kent, 29 April 1895; d London, 3 Oct 1967). English conductor. His father, a coal merchant at Stamford, Lincolnshire, was also an organist and choirmaster. Sargent spent his youth in this typical English country town, absorbing Gilbert and Sullivan, learning the piano and the organ, and singing in his father's choir. He was hardworking as well as precocious; amateur music-making went hand in hand with a grounding in church musicianship. At the age of 16 he took the ARCO and became articled pupil to the organist at Peterborough Cathedral. He was appointed parish organist at Melton Mowbray in 1914, took the BMus (Durham) in the same year and the doctorate, after brief army service, in 1919.

The breakthrough to more than local celebrity came in 1921 with an invitation to conduct his own Impression on a Windy Day with Henry Wood's Queen's Hall Orchestra, first at Leicester, then at a Promenade Concert in London. With Wood's encouragement he began to concentrate on conducting. He joined the teaching staff of the RCM in 1923, and settled in London the following year. He became chief conductor of the Robert Mayer Children's Concerts in 1924, and musical director of the Courtauld-Sargent Concerts in 1929. A serious illness in 1933–4 proved only a temporary interruption. He was involved from the beginning with the LPO which Beecham founded in 1932, and later toured with it during the Blitz. He was chief conductor of the Hallé Orchestra from 1939 to 1942, and of the Liverpool PO for six years after that. From 1950 to 1957 he was conductor of the BBC SO. He was chief conductor of the Promenade Concerts from 1948 until his death (though illness robbed him of what would have been his 20th season in 1967).

Orchestral work did not deflect him from the tradition on which he had been reared. Sargent was the outstanding British choral conductor of his time, unrivalled in his control of the customary massive forces. Choral singers gave him the unstinted devotion not always forthcoming from professional orchestral players, and he showed deeper involvement in the choral than in the instrumental works of the great Classical masters. He conducted the Royal Choral Society (including several seasons of the Royal Albert Hall staging of Coleridge-Taylor's Hiawatha) for nearly a quarter of a century, and the Huddersfield Choral Society for even longer. He was much in demand in the north of England: at the Leeds Festival of 1931 he gave the first performance of Walton's Belshazzar's Feast. His prowess with large choirs is commemorated in many recordings.

Sargent's sporadic operatic experience included the first performances of three operas by Vaughan Williams, Hugh the Drover (British National Opera Company, 1924), Sir John in Love (1929) and Riders to the Sea (1937), both for the RCM, and one by Holst – At the Boar's Head (BNOC, 1925). At Covent Garden in 1954 he gave the première of Walton's Troilus and Cressida. He was an assistant conductor for the 1927 and 1928 London seasons of Diaghilev's Ballets Russes. His longest theatrical attachment was to the D'Oyly Carte company, which he conducted on several occasions from 1926 and with which he made a number of recordings of Sullivan's operettas.

Sargent made numerous tours overseas, as a guest conductor or at the head of British orchestras or choirs, in Europe, the USA, the USSR, the Near and Far East, South Africa and Australasia. He was content to be described as 'Britain's ambassador of music', and it is possibly as a supremely efficient and energetic popularizer of music for listeners on many levels that he will be chiefly remembered. The personality – good looks, immaculate grooming, trim figure, punctilious attention to detail – was ideal for the job. He remained doggedly faithful to the standard Classics, to certain late Romantics (Dvořák and Sibelius among them), to Elgar, Vaughan Williams, Holst and Walton. In later years his interest in contemporary music hardly went further than Britten and Shostakovich, yet considering the radical nature of the changes, he adapted himself to the new Proms with considerable aplomb. Sargent was a fluent talker and a popular member of the wartime BBC Brains Trust. He was knighted in 1947, and received the gold medal of the Royal Philharmonic Society in 1959.

RONALD CRICHTON

Sari, Ada [Szayer, Jadwiga] (b Wadowice, nr Kraków, 29 June 1886; d Ciechocinek, 12 July 1968). Polish soprano. One of the most distinguished coloratura sopranos of her era, she studied singing in Kraków, Vienna and, from 1907 to 1909, with Antonio Rupnicek in Milan. In 1909 she made an acclaimed début as Marguerite (Faust) at the Teatro Drammatico Nazionale in Rome. She subsequently sang in many other Italian theatres, including Bologna, Florence, Venice, Naples (in Le prophète and Der Zigeunerbaron) and La Scala. She also sang Santuzza in Cavalleria rusticana under Mascagni and Nedda in Pagliacci under Leoncavallo in Alexandria. From about 1912 she began to concentrate on coloratura repertory. In the spring of 1914 she made an extensive concert tour of Russia with a group of Italian singers, and also performed in Warsaw, Lemberg and Kraków. After the outbreak of World War I she went to Vienna and then to Poland, joining the Lemberg (later Lwów) Opera in 1916 and the Warsaw Opera the following year; there her performances included Lucia di Lammermoor, Les Huguenots and Konstanze in Die Entführung aus dem Serail. In 1923 Sari settled in Milan, where she was engaged by La Scala; that year she sang the Queen of Night under the direction of Toscanini. During the next decade she gave a series of triumphant concert tours in Europe and North America and regularly visited Poland. In 1934 she moved back to Warsaw, where she sang frequently at the Wielki Theatre. She spent the war years directing an underground opera studio in Warsaw, and after the war she sang with the opera companies in Wrocław and Kraków, as well as giving concerts and broadcasts. She retired in 1947 to devote herself to teaching.

Sari possessed a phenomenal coloratura technique and a large, resonant voice, with an impressively clear timbre. The lightness of her staccato was breathtaking, but she was also capable of great dramatic power. Her gifts, which included a natural stage temperament, were shown to particular advantage in the roles of Rosina, Gilda, Lakmé, Violetta and Lucia. The charm and virtuosity of Sari's singing are evident in her few recordings of individual arias and songs, mostly dating from 1925.

BARBARA CHMARA-ŻACZKIEWICZ

Sári, József (b Lenti, 23 June 1935). Hungarian composer and teacher, brother of László Sáry. From 1954 to 1962 he studied composition with Szervánszky and choral conducting with Vásárhelyi at the Liszt Academy of Music, Budapest. At first a teacher at a music school and director of a chamber orchestra in Budapest, in 1971 he settled in the Federal Republic of Germany; there he worked as a freelance musician and teacher. After returning to Hungary in 1984 he was appointed to teach theory and 20th-century music at the Budapest Academy; he became director of the theory department in 1992 and made full professor in 1997. In 1996 Sári was elected to the Hungarian section of the ISCM. His Zeitmühle won the prize of Internationaler Arbeitkreis für Musik in 1984 and Fünf Klangmodelle the Bärenreiter Hausmusikpreis in 1985; he is also the recipient of the Erkel Prize (1991), the Bartók-Pásztory Prize (1995) and the title Artist of Merit (1998).

His early works clearly show the influence of Bartók. The chamber pieces of the late 1960s and early 70s, on the other hand, mark the beginnings of a personal musical expression; already apparent is his greater attention to rhythmic detail and a tendency towards asymmetry. He is most prolific in composing chamber instrumental music. Of this, noticeable is the highly idiomatic writing for flute, the frequent use of canon (an embodiment of the composer's ideal, 'uni-notionality'), and the recurring influence of the music of Ligeti; his Symbole (1978), for example, contains meccanico passages and a gesticulating trombone solo suggestive of Adventures, while Scenes, in homage to the composer, is a response to Ligeti's celebrated Continuum for solo harpsichord. In the virtuoso Four Inventions, Sári draws on Nancarrow's studies for player piano as well as Ligeti's Etudes. The use of quotation and parody in his music is partly a critical commentary on postmodernism.

ZOLTÁN FARKAS

Sārindā [qeychak, sarang, sarinda, sorud, soruz]. Double-chested fiddle of southern Afghanistan (used by the Pashtun and Baluchi people) and South Asia. The body is very distinctive: basically heart-shaped (broad at the top, pointed at the bottom and rounded at the back), it is deeply waisted at the sides, on the anterior part of the body (in East India, the waisting often continues to the back), leaving two large symmetrical, open barbs as the upper bouts and a smaller ovoid or inverted barbed section as the lower (see illustration). Only the lower section is covered with a skin soundtable, and on this rests a wooden bridge, usually at an angle. The neck is short and in many types the unfretted fingerboard extends vertically across the upper chamber. The pegbox is often bent back, with lateral pegs, and in some areas is surmounted by a carved bird. The bow is heavy and curved.

The sārindā type is widespread from eastern Iran (the sorud) to North-East India. In Afghanistan, Pakistan and North India it is usually called sārindā; in Baluchistan,

1. Sārindā (spike fiddle) of Afghanistan

Sind, and Rajasthan it is known as surando, saroz and surindā; in East and North-East India as banam, sarejā and sananta; and in Nepal as sārangī. The sārindā is related to, and may derive from, the Central Asian shaman's fiddle qobuz; its use in Baluchistan and Sind in exorcism and to cure melancholia further indicates relationship with that instrument. In north-western areas it commonly accompanies vocal or flute music, while in the north-eastern states it may accompany traditional dance, sometimes with the dotārā (long lute). It is played in an upright position.

JOHN BAILY/R, ALASTAIR DICK/R

Sárközy, István (b Pesterzsébet, 26 Nov 1920). Hungarian composer. He was a piano pupil of Lula Földessy-Hermann and from 1938 studied composition at the Higher Music School in Budapest with Farkas, and from 1939 at the Liszt Academy of Music with Kodály, Szatmári and Viski. During the period 1939–44 he earned his living as a statistician. In 1945 he became artistic leader of the youth organization at the academy, in 1947 secretary of the Bartók College and in 1950 music critic of the daily paper Népszava. He was a founder-member of the Association of Hungarian Musicians (1949) and in 1954 he was appointed artistic adviser to the National Philharmonic Concert Bureau and the Hungarian Recording Company. In 1957 he was made general editor of Editio Musica and in 1959 he was appointed to teach theory at the Liszt Academy of Music, subsequently teaching composition there.

Sárközy's first work of lasting value was the Concerto grosso of 1943, though during that decade his attention was directed mainly to songs and folksong arrangements. In the early 1950s music for the stage dominated his creative activity; for his successful musical plays Liliomfi and Szelistyei asszonyok ('The Women of Szelistye') he received the Erkel Prize in 1952. The crowning work of this period was the chamber cantata Júlia énekek ('Julia Songs', 1956), after which he composed little, until, in 1963 the Sinfonia concertante for clarinet and strings initiated a succession of major works. In 1975 Sárközy received the title Merited Artist of the Hungarian People's Republic. After Confessioni (1979) for piano and orchestra he devoted himself exclusively to teaching.

MÁRIA ECKHARDT

Sarmientos, Jorge Alvaro (b San Antonio Suchitepéquez, nr Mazatenango, 19 Feb 1931). Guatemalan composer and conductor. He received his first formal musical training at the National Conservatory in Guatemala City with Ricardo Castillo. Later he was awarded two fellowships for advanced study at the Ecole Normale de Musique, Paris (1955–6), and the Instituto Torcuato di Tella in Buenos Aires (1965–6). Through the teaching of composers like Ginastera he acquired a knowledge of new music which led to an expansion of his technical resources and considerably influenced his style. Serial technique and aleatory means (in his two sextets for piano and wind, and in his Third Piano Concerto), as well as cluster technique (in orchestral works such as La muerte de un personaje, Hommage and Ofrenda y gratitud) became part of his personal style. He took conducting courses with Boulez (1969) and Celibidache (1972). He was the musical director of the Guatemalan National SO from 1972 to 1991 and has guest-conducted orchestras in numerous countries throughout Latin America, and in France, the United States, Israel and Japan, often including his own works in his programmes. Sarmientos, who has been awarded numerous awards and distinctions, has taught at the National Conservatory in Guatemala (1967–91), the Rafael Landívar University (1968–80) and the Francísco Marroquín University (1982–6).

DIETER LEHNHOFF

Śārṅgadeva [Niḥśaṅka] (fl early 13th century CE). Indian scholar and music theoretician. The name Niḥśaṅka means 'free from doubt'. He was the author of the Sanskrit verse work Saṅgīta-ratnākara ('Ocean of Music'), perhaps the most important and influential of all treatises in the history of Indian music. Śārṅgadeva's grandfather Bhāskara, an Āyurvedic physician from Kashmir, moved to the Yādava court of Devagiri in the Deccan (modern Daulatabad, near Aurangabad) at a time of burgeoning patronage of scholarship and the arts towards the end of the 12th century. Śārṅgadeva, like his grandfather and his father Soḍhala, must also have been well versed in medical scholarship as well as other branches of learning; in the first book of the Saṅgītar-atnākara there is a detailed preliminary account of the human anatomy as the location of vocal and musical sound production. He even refers briefly to what appears to be a medical treatise of his own authorship called Adhyātmaviveka. But we know that he served at Devagiri at the court of Singhaṇadeva II (ruled 1210–47) principally as royal accountant or auditor general.

The Saṅgīta-ratnākara sets out to provide a comprehensive account of traditional Indian musical theory. It draws on the authority of numerous earlier sources, many of which we no longer possess as independent works aside from such quotations, and aims to combine all of the material into an encyclopedic and coherent summary. Furthermore it shows a conceptually logical and rigorous approach to the ordering of topics, as was customary in the traditional śāstric (scientific) method of Indian technical scholarship. Attention is also given to current musical practice, and some divergences are noted between what is contemporary and what is obsolete. Numerous later writers, indeed well into the modern era of Indian musicological scholarship, followed the terms, arguments and classificatory ideas of the Saṅgītar-atnākara even when these had become remote from the reality of both musical practice and the developing discourse of musicians. Of its seven chapters the first is concerned with the fundamentals and evolution of sound, from its genesis and raw state to that which is melodically, rhythmically and affectively articulated. The second chapter deals with rāga and its classification, the third with a miscellany of topics on the practice and conditions of musical performance, and the fourth with song forms and their compositional structure (prabandha). The fifth chapter deals with metrical patterns and their application to song composition, the sixth with musical instruments (including their classification, physical and material form, and their use in music-making), and the seventh with dance, which was traditionally one of the divisions of the musical art (saṅgīta). The first, second and sixth chapters contain a substantial quantity of notated melodic material to illustrate structures and compositional procedures.

There is no recent critical edition from the numerous manuscripts which are to be found of the Saṅgīta-ratnākara or of certain chapters of it, but the whole work has been printed in two reliable editions and the first half of it in a third, with English translation. Two Sanskrit commentaries, namely those of Siṃhabhūpāla (14th century) and Kallinātha (15th century), who was probably the grandfather of the music theoretician Rāmāmātya, are available in print. Others are still awaiting editing and publication, and there is an early Marathi commentary also yet to be edited and studied.

JONATHAN KATZ

Sarod [sarody]. Double-chested plucked lute, without frets, of northern South Asia. It is one of the most important instruments of Hindustani music. Like the sitār (long-necked lute) it belongs to the Indo-Muslim music culture within the classical tradition and is accompanied by the tablā. In its modern form the instrument is little more than a century old, having evolved from the RABĀB, which is still found in the north-western parts of South Asia, and the rubāb or rabāb of Afghanistan.

The present-day sarod is larger than the rabāb, about 103 cm long, has metal main and sympathetic strings and a metal fingerboard. These developments are credited to Ghulam Ali Khan, a mid-19th-century player of Afghan descent. Nowadays the sarod is found in two types, that of his gharānā or school and that of the more recent Allauddin Khan (1881–1972) gharānā.

On the modern Ghulam Ali sarod the soundchest, boat-shaped in profile, is divided in the middle by a rounded waist (see illustration). The lower chest, nearly round in front and about 30 cm in diameter, is somewhat spherical in shape, though flat-backed, and is about 26 cm deep; it is covered by a glued-on soundtable (khāl or puṛī), usually of goatskin, which extends also over the waist and in a narrow band on the upper chest. From the latter protrudes a short neck (both neck and chest are carved from a single piece of wood), covered, like the chest, with a chrome-metal, screwed-on fingerboard about 50 cm long which flares from a width of roughly 5 cm at the top to 15 cm at the bottom. The pegbox (now technically a peg-block) protrudes from the wooden rim which terminates the neck; it is a lightly tapering, bent-back, round-sectioned piece of wood through which the main pegs are inserted bilaterally. Many sarod have a small second resonator (tumbā) of wood and gourd (like that of the two-gourd sitār) or more often of metal, fixed behind the pegbox.

The sarod bridge (ghoṛā: 'horse') is a broad, arch-shaped piece of bone or ivory, about 7 cm wide, 2·5 cm high and 4 mm thick, with grooves on top for the main strings and small holes below for the secondary strings. It sits unsupported on the lower part of the soundtable. The string holder is a brass plate, with studs to attach the strings, screwed below the bottom rim of the bowl. Two cords running from the string holder prevent the bridge from moving upwards.

The Ghulam Ali sarod has six main strings (which pass over the nut) attached to large pegs fixed three on either side of the pegbox. Four are melody strings, tuned to the 4th and 1st notes of the middle octave and the 5th and 1st of the lower octave (the highest is steel, the others bronze). The sarod tonic is commonly c′, to which the fifth and sixth (steel) strings are tuned. Below the nut, on the upper side of the neck, are two more pegs for thin steel strings, the cikārī or punctuating strings, tuned to the upper tonic in a double course. These rise over grooves in a small ivory or bone post which serves as their nut. All eight main and cikārī strings pass over the upper edge of the bridge. In the right side of the upper chest are set 11 to 15 small pegs for the sympathetic or resonance strings (taraf, tarab). These rise from their pegs, inside the body, through small, bone-ringed holes in the fingerboard, passing down under the main strings to a row of small holes in the main bridge, below its upper edge, and are tuned to the scale of each rāga played.

The sarod of the Allauddin Khan school has somewhat larger dimensions and has different features and tuning (ma–sa–PA–SA–NI–ri–ga–sa–ṡa/ṡa). There are eight main strings running from the pegbox, with the two cikārī and the sympathetic strings as described above. The four melody strings have their pegs on the lower side, and only these pass over the nut. There are four steel drone strings ('javārī strings'), on the pegs of the upper side, passing over a small deep bridge with parabolically filed surface (javārī), projecting from the side of the nut. The eighth string is tuned to the middle tonic and passes over the top of the main bridge, the fifth, sixth and seventh to notes around this according to the rāga. These pass through a row of holes on the bridge between the main and the sympathetic strings.

The sarodiyā (sarod player) sits crossed-legged, supporting the middle of the instrument on his raised left thigh; the strings are plucked with a triangular wooden plectrum held by the thumb and fingers of the right hand. The oral rhythmic notation for the sarod is the same as for other Indian chordophones, but here the down beats (dā etc.) are played with a down-stroke and the upbeats (rā) with an up-stroke.

Sárosi, Bálint (b Csikrákos, 1 Jan 1925). Hungarian ethnomusicologist. He completed his education in Csikszereda (now Mercurea Ciuc, Romania), and took a doctorate in Hungarian and Romanian philology at Budapest (1948) and diplomas in musicology (1956) and composition (1958) at the Liszt Academy of Music, where his teachers included Kodály, Dénes Bartha, Bence Szabolcsi and Endre Szervánszky. After working from 1958 in Kodály's group for folk music research at the Hungarian Academy of Sciences he became head (1974) of the folk music department of the Institute for Musicology at that academy, later teaching at the universities of Innsbruck (1985–6) and Göttingen (1989, 1994) as guest professor. He was on the executive board of the ICTM (1985–90). He did fieldwork also in Ethiopia (1965) and Armenia (1972) and has lectured at many international conferences; he has done outstandingly important research in Hungarian instrumental folk music.

LUJZA TARI

Sarrette, Bernard (b Bordeaux, 27 Dec 1765; d Paris, 11 April 1858). French musical administrator, founder of the Paris Conservatoire. He held various administrative posts in the French Guards, and was later made a captain in the National Guard (13 July 1789), where he was responsible for the training of musicians. This new body of military musicians took part in various public ceremonies until 4 May 1790, when it was taken over by the city of Paris; it then took part in the first great civic festivities, particularly in the transference of Voltaire's ashes to the Panthéon (11 July 1791). In order to produce new recruits for the band and to increase its size, Sarrette drew up a plan for a school of military music, which was put into effect on 9 June 1792. 120 pupils, sons of soldiers serving in the National Guard, were granted free tuition; in return, the pupils and their teachers were called on to 'provide music for the National Guard and at public festivities'. Thus the first school for wind instrument players was established in France. A decree of 8 November 1793 transformed it into the Institut National de Musique; as such it participated still more fully in public festivities.

From 25 March to 10 May 1794 Sarrette was in prison because of an unreliable denunciation; in 1795 he was in trouble with the Committee of Public Safety. In the meantime the Institut was growing, admitting more pupils, offering more subjects and, for the first time, being given an administrative framework. This provided the basis for the founding of the Conservatoire, officially set up by a decree of 3 August 1795, a few days after a speech by Marie-Joseph Chénier; Sarrette was entrusted with its organization on 23 October. He set up the library and museum of the Conservatoire in 1798. Until the second Restoration, Sarrette's life was very unsettled. He repeatedly offered to relinquish his post, but was confirmed in it until finally he resigned in 1816.

FRÉDÉRIC ROBERT

Sarri [Sarro], Domenico Natale (b Trani, Apulia, 24 Dec 1679; d Naples, 25 Jan 1744). Italian composer. In his marriage contract dated 6 February 1705 he states that he came to Naples between the ages of six and seven, studied at the Neapolitan conservatory S Onofrio, and had not been outside the city since. His first known composition is a sacred opera, L'opera d'amore, performed in 1702 at the Arciconfraternita della SS Trinità de' Pellegrini. In 1703 he took part in a public competition (the other competitors being Gaetano Veneziano, Cristoforo Caresana and Francesco Mancini) for the vacant post of court maestro di cappella. Veneziano obtained the post, but on 26 December 1704 Sarri was appointed vicemaestro di cappella.

During 1706 and 1707 Sarri composed several operas for the Neapolitan public theatres. Between 1708 and 1718, however, he wrote few works of this kind: this may partly have been because of changed circumstances at court. In mid-1707 the Austrians captured Naples and drove out the Spanish regime to which Sarri had pledged allegiance. Both he and Veneziano lost their court appointments on 31 August 1707. There is no evidence from Neapolitan sources that the new Austrian government put Sarri back on its payroll before 1720, so the statement in the Venetian libretto of his intermezzo Barilotto, performed in Venice in 1712, that he was 'Maestro nella Real Cappella di Napoli' is almost certainly false. He nonetheless supervised the music in the Theatine church of S Paolo Maggiore and other churches in Naples, and composed most of 76 secular cantatas over this period.

Sarri's promise as a dramatic composer began fully to materialize in 1718. Between this date and 1741 he composed many operas, of which the earlier ones (i.e. those produced between 1718 and *c*1725) constitute perhaps his most significant contribution to music. Didone abbandonata (1724, Naples) is particularly important because it is the first setting of Metastasio's first major libretto. In 1720 Sarri was promised two important musical posts when they became vacant. The first was that of maestro di cappella to the city of Naples, which he obtained in 1728 on the death of the holder, Gaetano Greco. The second was that of vicemaestro di cappella to the court; to help the composer until he actually occupied this post, the viceroy awarded him a salary of 22½ ducats a month. He regained his post as vicemaestro, with a stipend of 30 ducats a month, in late October 1725, and he remained in the service of the court for the rest of his life. In 1735 he took over the duties, though not the title, of maestro di cappella at court when the holder of the post, Mancini, fell ill. When Mancini died in September 1737, Sarri was appointed his successor with a monthly salary of 35 ducats. One of his first tasks was to compose the opera for the official opening of the Teatro S Carlo, newly erected by order of Charles III. The opera was Achille in Sciro, given on 4 November 1737, Charles's name day. That this honour fell to Sarri was probably due in part to the recent deaths of Vinci (1730) and Pergolesi (1736), with Porpora and Hasse composing elsewhere.

Sarri was one of the first prominent composers to emerge from the Neapolitan conservatories during the 18th century. By choosing to confine his activities largely to Naples, he acquired only moderate fame abroad during his lifetime. Commentators have since tended to regard him as a transitional composer in between more important generations of Neapolitans represented on the one hand by the much older Alessandro Scarlatti and on the other by Porpora, Vinci, Leo, and other composers slightly younger than himself. His personal contribution to the important changes in musical style and technique that became apparent in Italian vocal music about 1720 has usually been underrated; Sarri's early operas show clearly his role in changing orchestration, form and melody to the new style. Describing these changes in his General History of Music (1789), Burney gave credit for them to Vinci, mentioning Sarri only briefly in this context. J.J. Quantz, after hearing Sarri's opera Tito Sempronio Gracco in Naples in 1725, declared that the composer was copying Vinci's style. Because of statements like these, Sarri has sometimes misleadingly been considered an imitator rather than innovator.

Sarri's earliest music contains both old and new; much is in the quasi-contrapuntal style associated with Alessandro Scarlatti, though it lacks the nervous energy characteristic of Scarlatti's best work, while other pieces are clearly among the earliest evidences of later change. By 1718, after a ten-year hiatus from serious opera, his musical textures had become less contrapuntal and his melodies more shapely as regards phrase structure and pitch. By about the time of his Valdemaro (1726) he had developed a style in which all the musical interest is in the top melodic part and the lower parts of the texture are reduced to mere accompaniment. His revisions of Didone for Venice in 1730 show further this shift of musical language. These are the changes in compositional method with which Burney credited Vinci. Sarri's relationship to Vinci has yet to be fully examined, but there is no present evidence that Vinci was more progressive than Sarri during the period 1718–23 when Sarri was the fashionable composer in Naples. After 1726, however, Vinci and Hasse had become prominent, and Sarri's period of greatest success was over. It thus seems that the period around 1720 was the one when Sarri made his most constructive contribution. Very few of his works written after 1730 survive. Achille in Sciro, his last extant work for the stage, is largely conservative in style, yet shows occasional brilliance and sensitivity to change. By the end of the 1730s his music was generally thought unfashionable. Charles de Brosses, who heard the 1739 Neapolitan revival of his opera Partenope (1722), called him 'knowledgeable but cold and sad', though apparently the work was received 'with great applause', perhaps by a conservative faction in the city. The Minister Ulloa, responsible for recommending the revival of Partenope to the king, who did not like the work, afterwards had to excuse himself: 'The composer Sarro has always been a most celebrated man. It is true however that he flourished in a bygone age'. He promised the king to see to it that the composer's next work, a festa teatrale called Le nozze di Teti e Peleo (1739), had music better suited 'to the grandeur of the joyous day and to good modern taste'. Little is known of Sarri's sacred music, though G. Bertini's Dizionario storico (1814–15) claims that Sarri's sacred compositions brought wide acclaim in Germany, and his winning the post of vicemaestro in 1704 was based on his submission of a mass.

MICHAEL F. ROBINSON/DALE E. MONSON

Sarrier, Antonio (fl 1725–62). Spanish composer and instrumentalist. His professional career began in 1725 when he became a timpani player with the King of Spain's guard. During the reign of Fernando VI he was a clarino player with the orchestra of Capilla Real, when the Royal chapel was under the direction of Francisco Courcelle and José Nebra. He also took part in various operatic and concert performances organized by Farinelli for the Spanish monarchs. Sarrier's only known work is a symphony (Obertura per violini, viola, oboe, trompas e basso) preserved in the archives of the Colegio de las Rosas, in Morelia, Mexico; it is noted for being the oldest extant orchestral score in sonata form on the American continent. This impeccably constructed work – probably intended to be played during the water parties of King Fernando and Queen Barbara at Aranjuez – reveals an early Classical style far more sophisticated than that of his contemporaries Soler, Nebra or Courcelle. (R. Miranda: Reencuentro con Antonio Sarrier, sinfonista y clarín, Mexico, 1997)

RICARDO MIRANDA-PÉREZ

Sarrus, Pierre Auguste (b St Affrique, 14/15 March 1813; d 3 May 1876). French inventor of woodwind instruments. A bandmaster in the French army, his name was given to the SARRUSOPHONE by its patentee the manufacturer Gautrot in 1856. In 1860 Sarrus himself patented the 'clarinette militaire', a wide-bore metal clarinet for military use which, he claimed, had cost him 20 years constant study and research. In 1864 he was made Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur.

Sarrusophone (Fr. sarrussophone; It. sarrusofono). A brass instrument of conical bore, played with a double reed. The complete family comprises the sopranino in E♭, soprano in B♭, alto (mezzo-soprano) in E♭, tenor in B♭, baritone in E♭, bass in B♭, and contrabasses in E♭, C, and B♭. All have a compass from a whole tone below the pitch note to a major 6th above its double octave. They are transposing instruments, and are all notated in the treble clef, with the exception of the contrabass in C, which is notated in the bass clef sounding an octave lower (like the contrabassoon). The tube of all but the two smallest sizes is bent back upon itself (on the bass and contrabass three times) to reduce it to a convenient length. The soprano in B♭ stands 72 cm tall, the contrabass in B♭ 132 cm. The reeds resemble those for bassoon, varying in size according to each instrument's pitch; that of the contrabass has blades over 4 cm long and 2·5 cm wide across the tip. Their tone, which is penetrating when the instrument is played forte, may be described as somewhat like that of a reedy saxophone. The 19th-century vogue for creating double-reed instruments made of metal also led to the development of the reed contrabass (a 16′-register instrument) and the ROTHOPHONE.

The sarrusophone was developed by the leading Paris workshop Gautrot aîné; the bass 'sarrusophone chromatique' in B♭ was patented in 1856 by Pierre Louis Gautrot, ten years after his rival Adolphe Sax had patented his family of saxophones. Sax's apologist Pontécoulant (Organographie, 1861) said that 'Gautrot, cherchant à contrebalancer le succès et la vogue du "Saxophone", imagina d'en produire une grossière imitation sous le nom de "Sarrusophone"'. In his 1867 catalogue Gautrot claimed to have 'invented them to replace par la nature de leur timbre the discarded military band double reeds, and to have named them after the bandmaster [Pierre Auguste Sarrus] who had given him the idea'. Since Sarrus (1813–76) was himself an inventor and patentee, and Gautrot, although nominally the titular owner of over 40 patents, was primarily a businessman rather than a maker, the identity of the actual inventor remains uncertain. The bore and shape of the larger models closely resembles that of the ophicleide, to which Gautrot had already in 1847 patented improvements. Though introduced in 1864 at Bayonne, it was at the Paris Exposition of 1867 that the entire family of nine sarrusophones was first officially shown. They were described as being easy to play, comfortably compact for marching use and, by the use of harder reeds, capable of delivering a greater puissance de son than their woodwind counterparts; Gounod composed a Choral et musette for sarrusophone sextet for the occasion.

1. Baritone sarrusophone in E♭ by Gautrot, Paris, late 19th century (Spencer Collection, Brighton Museum and Art Gallery)

The similarities between the sarrusophone and saxophone being too close for his liking, Sax unsuccessfully sued Gautrot for patent infringement. It is reported that Sax subsequently used his influence with the military authorities in order to prejudice them against giving the sarrusophone a fair trail in army bands, where the instrument failed to become properly established. However, the contrabass model was duly employed in operas by such French composers as Saint-Saëns (Les noces de Prométhée, 1867) and Massenet (Esclarmonde, 1889). Widor praised its rich, full tone in the hands of a competent player. Writing in Paris in 1904, he reported that the recently improved model in C had been adopted by both opera houses and by the main orchestras 'and was beginning to appear everywhere': it possessed distinct advantages over the double bassoon, being as flexible and supple over the entire register as either the oboe or english horn. In spite of the introduction in 1906 by Evette & Schaeffer (who had taken over Buffet-Crampon) of a French model of contrabassoon based on that of Heckel, the contrabass sarrusophone continued to be used by such composers as Dukas (L'apprenti sorcier, 1897), Ravel (Rapsodie espagnole, 1907–8, and L'heure espagnole, 1907–9), Boito (Nerone, first performed 1924), Delius and Lili Boulanger. Paderewski's Polonia Symphony op.24 (1907) called for no fewer than three. While for most of these scores the more common E♭ model suffices, the lower and less-used model in C is occasionally required.

In response to these demands, Evette & Schaeffer commenced from 1903 the production of all six models 'à mécanisme perfectionné'. Their sales figures reveal that, of the 115 sarrusophones built between 1903 and 1926, it was the E♭ contrabass model that prevailed. In 1920 they supplied a complete set to the US army. The following year C.G. Conn Ltd was awarded a government contract for 148 contrabass sarrusophones and they continued to make them until World War II. In order to facilitate its use, an alternative clarinet-type mouthpiece was also marketed by Conn and Gautrot's successor Couesnon (an idea which Sax had already patented in 1866). Other makers have Cabart (France), Laviña (Spain), and Rampone and Rancilio (Italy).

There is evidence that the entire sarrusophone family was used in French, Italian, and Spanish bands. Grainger scored for sopranino and tenor in Hill-Song no.1 (1901–2) and Holbrooke for alto and contrabass in Apollo and the Seaman (1907). The contrabass has found employment in jazz (the Paul Whiteman orchestra, and a 1924 recording by Sidney Bechet), and more recently in film. Stravinsky included the instrument in his score of Threni (1958). Current manufacturers of the sarrusophone are Orsi of Milan, who offer all six models (fig.2), and Schenkelaars & Brekoo of Eindhoven (contrabass only).

2. Sarrusophones, as shown in the Orsi catalogue, 1937: (a) soprano in B♭; (b) alto (contralto) in E♭; (c) tenor in B♭; (d) baritone in E♭; (e) bass in B♭; (f) contrabass in E♭

Sarti, Giovanni Vincenzo (b S Agata, ? nr Urbino; fl 1643–55). Italian composer. He was director of music at Forlì Cathedral in 1643; in 1648 he occupied a similar post at Ravenna Cathedral but returned to his former one at Forlì in 1655. His output consisted of sacred music, with a leaning typical of its date towards small-scale textures with few voices and continuo. His first four collections of motets are all lost. The last one (1655), which includes three dialogues, shows how the style of motets for few voices had matured by the mid-17th century. There is a wider range of keys and a more definite feeling of modulation; continuo parts are more profusely figured with 6–3 chords and 7–6 and 7–6–5 progressions rather than with the ubiquitous 4–3 suspensions of earlier years. The gradually increasing distinction between recitative and aria in opera is paralleled in his motets, which have recitative-like 4/4 sections and triple-time arioso passages with varied rhythms. (J. Roche: North Italian Church Music in the Age of Monteverdi, Oxford, 1984)

JEROME ROCHE

Sarti [Sardi], Giuseppe (b Faenza, bap. 1 Dec 1729; d Berlin, 28 July 1802). Italian composer. He was a leading figure in late 18th-century opera.

1. Life. Sarti was the seventh of 11 children of a jeweller who was also a violinist. He began his musical education with F.A. Vallotti in Padua and at the age of ten went to study with Padre Martini in Bologna. He was organist of Faenza Cathedral from 1748 to 1752, when he accepted the directorship of the theatre in Faenza, for which he wrote his first opera, Pompeo in Armenia. In December 1752 he became music director of Pietro Mingotti's opera troupe, which visited Copenhagen late in 1753. His talent and personality won him the admiration of King Frederik V, who in 1755 nominated him to succeed Scalabrini as court Kapellmeister. Later he became director of the Italian opera company at Copenhagen. He continued to compose opere serie and may also have written a Danish opera (Gram og Signe, 1756). When in 1763 the Italian opera was closed Sarti became director of court music; in this position he had the opportunity to compose instrumental works. In 1765 the king sent him back to Italy to engage singers for the proposed reopening of the opera; but the king died, and Sarti remained in Italy for the next three years. On 25 March 1766 his oratorio La sconfitta de' Cananei was performed in Rome. From 19 May 1766 to 11 September 1767 he was maestro di coro at the Ospedale della Pietà in Venice. During this time he composed several serious works, as well as his first comic piece for the stage, the intermezzo La giardiniera brillante. On his return to Copenhagen in 1768 he resumed the post of director of the royal chapel and became the king's singing teacher. From 1770 to 20 May 1775 he directed the court theatre, for which he wrote both Italian and Danish works. While in Copenhagen he married Camilla Passi, by whom he had two daughters. In 1775 he was dismissed after siding with the wrong party in a series of political intrigues, and returned to Italy.

In 1779 Sarti entered a competition to become maestro di cappella of Milan Cathedral. His victory (with an eight-voice mass for the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the patron saint of the cathedral) and the successful revival of his Le gelosie villane at La Scala greatly increased his reputation and won him many pupils, including Cherubini. During these years Sarti created a series of works that were extremely popular throughout Europe and brought his fame to its zenith; these included, besides Le gelosie villane (1776), the comic opera Fra i due litiganti (1782) and the serious operas Medonte (1777) and Giulio Sabino (1781). In 1782 Grand Duke Paul of Russia heard his Alessandro e Timoteo at Parma and suggested to Catherine II that Sarti might succeed Paisiello as director of the imperial chapel. The empress extended the invitation, and in 1784 he left Italy for St Petersburg, stopping in Vienna where he was graciously received by Joseph II and given the proceeds of a performance of Fra i due litiganti, which had gained great favour there. He met Mozart, who played to him and spoke of him as an honest, good man. Mozart later quoted the theme of 'Come un agnello' from Fra i due litiganti in Don Giovanni. Sarti seemed unable to understand Mozart's quartets dedicated to Haydn and in his Esame acustico fatto sopra due frammenti di Mozart he pointed out numerous 'barbarisms' and concluded with Rousseau's words 'de la musique pour faire boucher les oreilles'.

In St Petersburg Sarti was showered with honours, and under his direction the Italian opera reached an artistic peak. His outstanding works of this period were the comic opera I finti eredi (1785) and the opera seria Armida e Rinaldo (1786). He also wrote French and German works and even collaborated with Pashkevich and Canobbio on a Russian opera, Nachal'noye upravleniye Olega ('The Early Reign of Oleg', 1790). This work, which was the sensational event of the season and remained in the repertory for the next five years, was based on a libretto by Catherine II, who supervised the production herself. For the empress's choir Sarti composed several Russian oratorios, a Te Deum to celebrate the taking of Ochakov by Potyomkin and a requiem in memory of Louis XVI. Court intrigue involving the mezzo-soprano Luisa Todi sent Sarti into seclusion in a village in Ukraine given him by Prince Potyomkin. There he founded a singing-school which later produced some important singers. In 1793 the empress restored him to favour and appointed him director of a conservatory modelled on those in Italy, a position he retained for the rest of his stay in Russia. While there he invented a machine for counting the vibrations of sounds, and thereafter he established a pitch standard for the St Petersburg orchestras (a' = 436). In 1801, after the death of the emperor, he decided to return to Italy. He broke his journey in Berlin to visit one of his daughters who was married to the queen mother's Kapellmeister, Natale Mussini. He died while still in Berlin and was buried in the Hedwigkirche.

2. Works. During a time when opere serie were seldom revived, and three productions of a single work were rare, Sarti's serious operas reached an astonishing level of popularity. 19 had at least two productions and eight of these were revived three or more times. Giulio Sabino had more than 20 productions and Medonte more than 30, numbers that rivalled exceptionally popular comic operas. Among his comic operas I contrattempi and I finti eredi achieved moderate success, and Fra i due litiganti and Le gelosie villane had between 30 and 40 productions. Among his admirers Sarti could count Haydn, who directed six of his operas at Eszterháza over a nine-year period. Sarti's almost immediate acclaim in Italy seems all the more remarkable because he had spent ten years writing traditional opera seria at the Danish court. On his return to Italy he had an opportunity to compose works to librettos by Giovanni de Gamerra (Medonte), Pietro Giovannini (Giulio Sabino) and Ferdinando Moretti (Idalide). These three operas represent some of the most traditional work of these innovatory librettists (though Idalide has an exotic Peruvian setting, a temple scene incorporating dance and a volcanic eruption).

Sarti also became involved in the newly revived opera in Florence during the reign of Archduke Leopold, who had been in Vienna at the time of Gluck's activity there. Sarti's first Olimpiade (1778) suggests an acquaintance with Paisiello's pioneering version of Nitteti for St Petersburg in 1777. Like Paisiello's Nitteti, Olimpiade includes not only the choruses of Metastasio's original, but also, in the middle of Act 1, a sacrificial scene with a giuramento for antiphonal chorus, and a dance of celebration. As in the heavily revised version of Traetta's Nitteti given in St Petersburg in 1769, a chorus follows the duet at the end of Act 1 and introduces a ballet related to the subject of the opera. In the sextet that concludes Act 2, three-part counterpoint and contrasting tempos and textures heighten the dramatic intensity of the 'horrible tempest' in the poetry. Sarti's setting of Achille in Sciro for Florence in 1779 also includes the choruses that most Italian productions omitted, and his Mitridate a Sinope of the same year begins with an introductory ensemble, rare in opera seria at that time.

In St Petersburg Sarti found himself at a court with strong ties to French culture. As in Parma and Vienna, Italian operas were frequently based on French-inspired texts and incorporated spectacular elements such as dance, pantomime, chorus, supernatural appearances and scene complexes in which the formal convention of the exit aria is suspended to admit fluent sequences of recitative, ensemble, chorus and cavatina. Sarti's Alessandro e Timoteo for Parma clearly demonstrates his ability to write a French-inspired opera, and similar works followed in Russia – Armida e Rinaldo and Castore e Polluce. His festa teatrale Astrea placata and the pastorales Narciso and Il naufragio di Cipro for Copenhagen in the 1760s have similar characteristics, as well as many ensembles. Il naufragio opens with an extensive, programmatic scene complex to accompany a shipwreck, and later a dragon appears. (Mozart's Idomeneo shares these memorable elements.) In the most curious of Sarti's works, his Russian opera The Early Reign of Oleg, he attempted to imitate the style of the ancient Greeks; the use of Russian subject matter and folk music foreshadows later Russian national opera.

Most of Sarti's comic operas conform to Goldoni's plan: an introductory ensemble with multi-sectional, action-ensemble finales closing Acts 1 and 2 and a simpler ensemble finale to conclude Act 3. The rest of the opera consists of recitatives and arias, with a duet for the principal buffo couple. His two greatest successes closely follow this pattern: Fra i due litiganti has a large quartet in Act 2 and a fashionable aria with interjections by a second character; Le gelosie villane has several trios, one of which dwindles to a solo when two of the characters depart. Beside these works, Il militare bizzarro (1778, Venice) and I finti eredi (1785, St Petersburg) stand out as notable exceptions. The first has a large action ensemble in each act (a quartet and a sextet respectively), and the second has a quintet leading to a sextet in Act 2 and incorporates chorus and dance, notably in the last finale, set at a ball.

The multiple ensembles and choruses that were to invade both serious and comic opera in the 1790s were only beginning to come into vogue during Sarti's most active period of composition. Thus his celebrated reputation must have rested almost solely on his arias. His aria forms progress from the da capo al segno (with the sign marked at the entrance of the voice) in the early 1760s, through the modified dal segno (with the sign in the second statement of the first section) of the late 1760s, to the variety of forms found in the 1770s and 80s, when through-composed ternary and abbreviated binary forms (AA′ or AB) predominated, interspersed with the occasional da capo minuet and various rondo forms (particularly two-tempo rondòs for the principals). Shortened rondo forms (ABA′B′) predominate in his comic operas. Contrasting tempos reflect changes of mood in the poetry, and Sarti was quick to exploit opportunities to end with a fast section. Some time during the late 1760s he stopped composing the words of his ensembles twice over and wrote dynamic multi-sectional pieces in several tempos, concluding with a fast tutti. In his opere serie, bravura arias with lavish melismatic sections alternate with charmingly ornamented, decorative pieces, and in the dramatic works of great emotional intensity the musical style moves abruptly, contrasting the declamatory with the tender and lyrical, as the text demands. Tonality and modality range widely, expressing violently contrasting emotions or events. Chromaticism is also used with particularly striking effect.

Historians have been unduly harsh in assessing Sarti. While he was certainly sometimes guilty of producing good effects at the expense of musical nuance, he stands head and shoulders above his contemporaries in the richness and variety of his orchestral effects. Strong contrasts in dynamics, tonality and tempo, use of wind colour and varied orchestral accompaniment enhance the meaning of the words. He might detach the bassoons, cellos and violas from the continuo to double a singer's part or to take solo or obbligato roles; he used wind instruments during the vocal parts and in B sections, places where few of his contemporaries did so. When given the opportunity he exploited the more unusual wind instruments: clarinets at Naples and Milan, the serpent at St Petersburg and the english horn at Mestre. Marches are common in his operas, and in Vologeso he even provided the battle music, a task often left to someone else. He also composed ballet music for Castore and Alessandro. Sarti's meticulous and expressive orchestration produced powerfully dramatic obbligato recitatives, combining sustained accompaniment with string tremolo or measured arioso for deeply emotional expression.

Sarti wrote a considerable amount of sacred music which reflects an admirable technical mastery in its effective combination of contrapuntal church style with the dramatic devices of the opera. Theatricality is evident in the early oratorio La sconfitta de' Cananei, whose biblical theme is told more in action than narrative. The anonymous text, declaimed by four soloists and double chorus, reflects a Metastasian aesthetic of dramaturgy, and the orchestra offers descriptive commentary, especially in the long orchestral introductions to the vocal pieces. Sarti composed much church music for Milan Cathedral; here his solid contrapuntal skills and natural melodies are united with the austerity of the Ambrosian tradition. Melodic fragments from Ambrosian chant are incorporated in many liturgical works, including the music he submitted to the competition in 1779. The Ambrosian model is often laid out in measured notes sung by the entire choir and then surrounded by elaborate polyphony. Responsorial style structuring is also present. His most innovative sacred music was composed for elaborate Russian state celebrations. For these grandiose outdoor spectacles Sarti wrote brilliant oratorios for large double choruses and orchestra, which include the trademark Russian horns, bells and cannon fire. Grand echo effects and dynamic contrasts are created by alternating solo voices and choirs which add to the festive quality of these highly original oratorios inspired by Russian culture.

It has been suggested (Armbruster, 1997) that there existed a composer and keyboard player, Giuseppe Sardi, active in Vienna during the 1780s, who composed some of the instrumental music normally ascribed to Sarti. The form of the name 'Sardi' appears in a few Artaria advertisements and as a compound of the name of the singer Dorothea Bussani-Sardi. It is uncertain whether there existed a composer called Sardi, distinct from Sarti, or whether the name 'Sardi' is a product of orthographical confusion.

Sarto, Johannes de (*fl c*1430–40). Composer, singer and priest. The musician listed as a singer of Albrecht II, King of the Romans, in the motet Romanorum rex written in commemoration of the king's death in 1439, must be the same man who composed this and several other sacred works found in early 15th-century manuscripts. If his identity has yet to be established conclusively, the proposal that he was Johannes Doussart, a cleric of the diocese of Liège who was still alive in 1457, is very plausible, and distinctly more so than the earlier suggestion that he was the Cambrai-based musician Jean Du Sart.

Sarto's four surviving motets are written in an elegant and at times highly expressive melodic style, with well-controlled dissonance and occasional use of imitation. Verbum patris (notable for its use of common material at section ends) and Romanorum rex both employ complex mensural schemes; the latter, a technical tour de force, is remarkable for its simultaneous use of two distinct isorhythmic patterns. One introit survives with an uncontested attribution and in the case of two others Sarto's name has been substituted for that of his famous contemporary, Johannes Brassart, perhaps indicating some form of collaboration or rivalry. Evidently the two men were closely associated: both were members of the imperial chapel during the 1430s and were probably linked by affiliation to the same diocese (Liège); their works were sometimes copied next to or near one another; two of Sarto's motets, O quam mirabilis and Ave mater, O Maria, appear to be directly influenced by Brassart's O flos fragrans. The juxtaposition of the composers' names in some early 16th-century correspondence bears witness to a continuing association beyond their respective lifetimes.

PETER WRIGHT

Sartori, Claudio (b Brescia, 1 April 1913; d Milan, 11 March 1994). Italian musicologist and music bibliographer. After taking an arts degree with a thesis in music history supervised by Giusto Zampieri at the University of Pavia (1934), he studied with Gérold at the University of Strasbourg and with Franco Vittadini at Pavia Conservatory. He was assistant librarian at the Bologna Conservatory (1938–42), where he became professor of Italian literature (1943), a post he held later at the Milan Conservatory (1967).

Sartori was an outstanding bibliographer in the tradition of Eitner, Vogel and Einstein, and did equally important work. While conceding that bibliography is only 'a means of arriving at a deeper and surer knowledge of music itself', he realized the lack of such tools in his early music research and with great zeal set about providing them. His first publication dealing specifically with bibliography appeared in 1940, in the form of additions to a Scarlatti opera catalogue. He next published material uncovered during work in the Bologna Conservatory library, but his first significant publication was Bibliografia delle opere musicali stampate da Ottaviano Petrucci (1948), a subject to which he added in 1953. His reputation as a leading bibliographer was established with Bibliografia della musica strumentale italiana stampata in Italia fino al 1700 (1952). In this difficult undertaking, accomplished in spite of postwar chaos, he was advised and assisted by Einstein. The organization of the catalogue was based on Eitner's bibliography for secular music; corrections, additions and new indices appeared in the second volume (1968). It is a standard reference work and an invaluable handbook for all research on Italian instrumental music.

To compile the catalogue Sartori applied to all libraries in the West, and discovered that many important libraries had incomplete or inaccurate lists of holdings. He then began to exhort individual libraries to make catalogues, and edited various general lists of collections of printed music (in FAM, from 1955) and more particular lists of important manuscript collections (e.g. at the Lucca seminary, the cathedrals of Piacenza, Vercelli etc). In 1965 he eventually obtained financial support for his work and established the Ufficio Ricerche Fondi Musicali, of which he was director. The bureau aims to catalogue all manuscripts and printed music in Italy up to 1900, all printed Italian librettos up to 1800 (including operas, oratorios, serenatas, cantatas and balli) and all literature on music in Italy. This enormous project demands the cooperation of diligent research assistants, and its importance to musicology is evident in the huge quantity of requests (from everywhere in the world) that the centre handles. Another companion bibliographical tool, the list of Italian music publishers, appeared in 1958. In 1962 Sartori began a Cherubini catalogue and in the 1960s a revision of Vogel (published 1978). He always pursued subjects of general musicological interest, his outstanding work being on Josquin at Milan and on 16th- and 18th-century Milanese music. With Benvenuti he edited Classici Musicali Italiani (1941–3). He was a member of the RISM commission (1956–71) and he was on the editorial board of Acta musicologica, Dizionario Ricordi della musica e dei musicisti (Milan, 1959) and Enciclopedia della musica (Milan, 1963–4); he also edited the series Bibliotheca musica.

CAROLYN GIANTURCO

Sartorio [Sertorio], Antonio (b Venice, 1630; d Venice, 30 Dec 1680). Italian composer partly active in Germany. He was a leading composer of operas for Venice in the 1660s and 70s.

1. LIFE. Sartorio is first heard of with the production of his first opera, Gl'amori infruttuosi di Pirro, at the Teatro di SS Giovanni e Paolo, Venice, on 4 January 1661. His next opera, Seleuco, was first performed on 16 January 1666 in the Teatro S Salvador, popularly called S Luca, where most of his later operas were also produced. By then he had been named Kapellmeister to Duke Johann Friedrich of Brunswick-Lüneburg, who reigned from 1665 and resided at Hanover. This highly educated sovereign, who formed an alliance with Louis XIV in 1672 and also visited Italy four times and lent the republic of Venice substantial military aid against the Turks, had been converted to Catholicism in 1651, and on inheriting the dukedom he introduced the Catholic rite to his court. Sartorio took up his duties as Kapellmeister on Trinity Sunday 1666. The court Kapelle consisted of seven or eight singers and six instrumentalists, many of them Italian. Their repertory, part of which was discovered in 1958 in an organ bellows in the village of Hüpede, included masses, motets and psalms by Du Mont, Bonifatio Gratiani and Orazio Tarditi. Sartorio was paid 103 thalers in 1667 for bringing books of music from Italy, and he composed for the Kapelle a missa brevis and several vesper psalms and cantatas in both the stile antico and the stile moderno.

During his Hanover years, 1666–75, Sartorio often travelled to Venice in the winter, both to compose operas for Carnival and to enlist musicians for service at court. His first such journey was in 1666–7. On 15 January and 3 February 1667 his remarkable double opera, La prosperità d'Elio Seiano and La caduta d'Elio Seiano, was produced; the librettist, Nicolò Minato, originally intended the two operas to be given on successive nights, but it appears that Sartorio and the singers overruled him. Sartorio spent the winter of 1668–9 in Hanover, but he was in Venice again for the Carnival of 1669–70, during which his next opera, L'Ermengarda regina de' longobardi, was performed. The librettist, Pietro Dolfin, a friend of both Sartorio and Duke Johann Friedrich, administered the duke's theatre loges and corresponded regularly with him between 1669 and 1678; his unpublished letters (in D-HVsa) are a valuable source of information about Venetian opera performances. Sartorio's next stay in Venice lasted an entire year, from January or February 1672 to Carnival 1672–3. On 19 February 1672 his best-known opera, L'Adelaide, was given for the first time (see illustration). The libretto is again by Dolfin, who reworked some of Gissilla's arias into a cantata by adding recitatives. Sartorio seems to have responded to Dolfin's wish to have the recitatives set, for a Cantata di Gissilla is extant; it was apparently conceived for a pupil of Dolfin's named Lucretia, who had sung a role in the opera, probably that of Gissilla.

Poor health, but also the invitation to write one of two operas for S Luca in the coming Carnival, prevented Sartorio from returning to Hanover that spring. The lengthy correspondence on this subject shows that Dolfin was finally able to persuade the duke to let Sartorio remain because of the peril of the journey and because of the honour of having been asked to write the opera, the other being by no less a composer than Cavalli. In the event Sartorio wrote both operas for S Luca. L'Orfeo was first given on 14 December 1672. Although the Florentine emissary, M.A. Altoviti, reported on 14 January (in a document in I-Fas) that Carnival was 'proceeding … with not much applause for these first operas' and Dolfin found the scenery and costumes merely ordinary and Aurelio Aureli's libretto 'very bad', both Sartorio's music and the singing of Tonina Coresi, who came specially from Rome to sing the part of Euridice, were highly praised. Dolfin's objections could have had to do with the fact that Aureli, catering for the fashion of the day, had added to the intricacy of the plot by making Orfeo a jealous husband and by adding fictitious minor episodes that jarred more than usually with the main plot. The other opera at S Luca in this Carnival was to have been Cavalli's Massenzio. It went into rehearsal, but there it was decided that it would not do, 'for lack of spirited ariettas' (Dolfin). Brusquely, the theatre managers turned the entire project over to Sartorio. No incident could better illustrate the difference between the old school and the new, between Cavalli, the dramatist trained in the school of Monteverdi and using the arioso as his vehicle for dramatic exposition, and Sartorio, for whom opera was first and foremost a brilliant spectacle and the aria the chief means of moving the listener. Sartorio wrote his Massenzio in only 13 days, and it was performed from 25 January 1673. It contains no fewer than 78 arias and duets, a typical number for his operas.

Sartorio spent the following two years at Hanover and then left Duke Johann Friedrich's employ for good in April 1675, receiving a parting gift of 50 thalers and a golden chain. He remained on good terms with the duke, corresponded regularly with him about negotiations with singers or visits on his behalf to cloistered ladies, and continued to call himself a court composer in his remaining operas. He settled in Venice, in the quarter of S Giovanni Grisostomo. On 7 May 1676 he was appointed vicemaestro di cappella of S Marco, defeating Carlo Grossi by three votes. On 17 December, his Giulio Cesare in Egitto received its first performance and was particularly successful. Four further operas succeeded it in 1677–9. On 18 December 1679 Duke Johann Friedrich died at Augsburg at the start of his fifth journey to Italy. 1680 saw the appearance of Sartorio's only printed volume of music, a set of eight-part psalms for two choirs. Towards the end of the year he began to compose another opera, La Flora, but he died before he could finish it, after seven months of illness; it was finished by M.A. Ziani and performed at the Teatro S Angelo as the first opera of the new Carnival season. Sartorio was succeeded at S Marco by Legrenzi.

Autograph of the opening of Act 2 scene i of Sartorio's opera 'L'Adelaide', first performed at the Teatro S Salvador, Venice, 1672 (D-HVl IV.410)

According to his epitaph in S Giovanni Grisostomo, Venice, he died at the age of 50. GASPARO SARTORIO was his brother. Another brother, Girolamo [Hieronymo], also had connections with the theatre, as an architect.

2. WORKS. Sartorio's operas, like those of his Venetian contemporaries, deal with heroic themes. In some of them – La caduta d'Elio Seiano, Massenzio and Antonino e Pompeiano – true Senecan tragedy is evoked as death comes to a tyrant. Sejanus commits suicide, wishing the universe to be plunged into chaos, and Antonino is assassinated on stage by the liberators of Rome. Sartorio's greatness as a composer lay in discovering the variety and, more important, the depth of the passions expressed by his librettists. His talent for writing many different kinds of aria was fully developed even in his first opera, Gl'amori infruttuosi di Pirro (produced in 1661), which set the pattern for his subsequent operas in containing a large number of arias – several have more than 70. Some of the most noteworthy arias in this work, which recur in similar form in later operas, are Circea's rage aria 'Son tradita' (in Act 3 scene xi), with its florid coloratura ascending to b″, and her aria in 3/2 time, 'Le promesse de gl'amanti' (Act 1 scene viii), in which the inconstancy of lovers' promises is shown by the incessantly wandering crotchets of the bass line.

Sartorio was at his best in two types of aria, the lament and the trumpet aria. The laments are usually written in 3/2 time over an ostinato bass, which is often chromatic.

Sartorio was very fond of ostinatos. Some of his most moving laments are Oreste's 'Hermiona, qual sventura' (Gl'amori infruttuosi di Pirro, Act 3 scene vi), Adalberto's 'Qual colpa mi date' (L'Adelaide, Act 2 scene vii) and Orfeo's 'E morta Euridice' (L'Orfeo, Act 3 scene iii), the beginning of which is shown in ex.1. This example also shows how the strings invariably accompany the voice when they are employed in an aria. This is in the manner of an echo: voice and strings rarely participate in more than a few notes simultaneously (although 'Qual colpa mi date' is an exception to this rule). Sartorio also reveals here his penchant for harmonic harshness. In this example such clashes (in which the notes in question are indicated by crosses) can be explained by the affection of extreme suffering. For expressive purposes he reduced the string body on occasion to four violas (preceding Orfeo's aria 'D'un'amante, che sospira' in L'Orfeo, Act 3 scene iii) or even two (in Antioco's aria 'Per pietà, datemi morte' in Seleuco, Act 3 scene viii).

Sartorio wrote many trumpet arias. He turned to this instrument to express more adequately the heroic affection pertaining to the grand personages depicted in his operas. He first wrote for trumpet – two in D – in 1672, in the sinfonia to L'Adelaide. Although certain of Cavalli's operas – Le nozze di Teti e di Peleo (1639), La Rosinda (1651) and L'Elena (1659) – as well as Boretti's Marcello (1670) and Sartorio's own Gl'amori infruttuosi di Pirro (1661) make some mention of the trumpet in their texts and even feature imitations of trumpet fanfares in their string writing (as many other operas do), L'Adelaide appears to be the first in a long line of Venetian operas to call specifically for the trumpet. Sartorio wrote for a solo trumpet in D in Massenzio (an aria of Fame), Antonino e Pompeiano (two sinfonias, and arias of Fame and Antonino), Giulio Cesare in Egitto (four arias, two sinfonias and a 'tocco di Tromba'), L'Anacreonte tiranno (a sinfonia, and two arias of Oronte) and La Flora (three sinfonias, an aria of Flora and two arias of Geminio). In these arias the trumpet alternates with the voice, just as the strings do in arias with strings (see ex.2 for the beginning of Fame's aria in Massenzio).

Another mark of Sartorio's style is the juxtaposition of the heroic and the base. Comic figures – usually an old nurse, sung by a tenor – sing arias whose melodies consist of short phrases moving chiefly in quavers, either on one pitch or stepwise. This popular element has appeared to some commentators as a sign of artistic impoverishment, but it should rather be seen in the context of the whole range of Baroque affections.

EDWARD H. TARR

Sartorio [Sertorio], Gasparo (b Venice, between 18 Oct 1625 and 17 Oct 1626; d Venice, 17 Oct 1680). Italian composer and organist, brother of ANTONIO SARTORIO. In 1650 his opera Orithia, to a libretto by Count Maiolino Bisaccioni, was performed at the Teatro SS Apostoli, and his L'Erginda, to the first libretto written by Aurelio Aureli, was given at the same theatre in 1652. He composed the third act of Iphide greca (1671; I-Vnm IV-421, = 9945), the music for Acts 1 and 2 being by Gian Domenico Partenio and Domenico Freschi respectively. The opera Armidoro, performed at the Teatro S Cassiano on 20 January 1651, is attributed to Sartorio by Ivanovich, but to Cavalli in other sources; the music is now lost. In January 1673 he failed to obtain the position of organist at S Cassiano. On 16 October 1676 he and Antonio Sartorio were godfathers at the baptism of Girolamo Sartorio's son, Casparus Antonius, at St

Clemens, Hanover. According to his epitaph in S Fosca, Venice, he died at the age of 54.

Sartorius, Christian (b Querfurt; d Kulmbach, bur. 14 April 1676). German composer and administrator. In 1626 Margrave Christian of Brandenburg-Kulmbach, residing at Bayreuth, engaged him as a personal servant and musician. Nothing is known about his duties at a time when musical life was oppressed by the Thirty Years War. After 20 years at court Sartorius was installed in 1646 as official (later steward) with special appointment for musical matters at the secularized monastery at Himmelkron, near Bayreuth. He lived there until 1671 at the latest; again, there are no documents relating to his activities.

In 1655 Sartorius wrote the funeral music for Margrave Christian; it was scored for five voices and instruments and published as Fürstlicher Ruhm- und Leich-Text (Bayreuth, 1655). The new margrave, Georg Albrecht, and his son Christian Ernst were the dedicatees of a set of sacred concertos for a similar combination of voices and instruments, Unterschiedlicher teutscher nach der Himmelcron Zielender hoher Fest- und Danck-Andachten Zusammenstimmung (Nuremberg, 1658). This collection, arranged according to the liturgical calendar, in some ways reflects the average standards of German church music at the time: vocal parts normally move in pairs, especially in parallel 3rds and 6ths; the continuo bass serves mainly as harmonic foundation; and the melody is usually in the top part, while the alto voice has vanished altogether. The use of obbligato instruments, which are treated in a manner distinctly different from the vocal parts, points towards the new style, but Sartorius's music is not free from some of the shortcomings that Schütz had foreseen in the preface to his Geistliche Chor-Music (1648): the harmonies are either dull or jerky, and technical faults such as false relations and parallel 5ths and octaves appear frequently. Sartorius's technique suggests a dilettante rather than a well-trained composer. This perhaps explains why he was not called back to the Bayreuth court when Margrave Christian Ernst reorganized the Hofkapelle and introduced opera. His Andachten, however, could be performed by modest forces and thus fitted well the needs of Kantors and teachers in the small Protestant towns who tried to re-establish regular church music in the period after the Thirty Years War.

DOROTHEA SCHRÖDER

Sartorius, Erasmus (b Schleswig, 1577; d Hamburg, 17 Oct 1637). German writer on music and composer. He was a choirboy at Gottorf Castle, the residence of the dukes of Holstein. After attending the Gymnasium at Bordesholm, he went to the University of Rostock, where in 1603 or 1604 he was appointed Kantor at the Marienkirche. From 1605 until his death he worked in Hamburg as Kantor of the Johanneum and civic music director. He fostered the performance of polychoral music, a material witness of which was the construction of choir lofts in the main churches. When in 1607 the Gothic St Gertruden was reconsecrated after a period of disuse, Sartorius directed a solemn service with polychoral works by Lassus, Hieronymus Praetorius and Gallus, one of the most memorable events in the music history of Hamburg. At the domed chapel, famous for its acoustic, he established the city's tradition of annual performances of Passion music, beginning in 1609 and engaging instrumentalists for the first time in 1612. He also directed polyphonic music with the Johanneum choir at the four main churches, for which he received payments from 1612. He was held in high esteem by his colleagues: on the occasion of his first marriage (1627) a number of poems and wedding songs appeared, by Hieronymus Praetorius and Johann Schop, among others.

Sartorius published two theoretical works. The first, Belligerasmus, id est Historia belli exorti in regno musico (Hamburg, 1622, rev. 3/1639 as Musomachia, id est Bellum musicale by P. Lauremberg, 4/1642), describes the battle between Bisthon and Orpheus, the would-be successors to Apollo and the leaders of monodic and polyphonic music respectively. Imitating reports of military campaigns, Sartorius commented on the effects and advantages of music and considered the qualities of both musica choralis and figuralis. Although the title and structure of his book bear some resemblance to Claudius Sebastiani's Bellum musicale (1563), Sartorius did not draw from it; instead he used similar discourses on non-musical subjects as models. His second treatise, Institutionum musicarum tractatio nova et brevis (Hamburg, 1635), was intended to serve as a theoretical and practical manual. Concerning solmization, he mentioned reforms like Calvisius's 'bocedization' method, yet recommended adherence to the old system. Like Burmeister, he ascribed the characters of the modes to the position of tones and semitones around the important notes of a melody. His musical examples are taken mostly from Lassus and Praetorius, while his own Fugae aliquot (2–8 parts, Hamburg, 1635; 12 ed. F. Jöde, Der Kanon, i, Wolfenbüttel, 1943) probably served as a supplement. He also published a wedding song (Veni dilecte mi; Hamburg, 1606), and, according to Seiffert, two motets – one for four voices, one for solo voice, and both with instruments – signed 'Sartorius' were formerly held at the library of the Michaeliskirche, Lüneburg.

MARTIN RUHNKE/DOROTHEA SCHRÖDER

Sartorius [Schneider, Schneickher], Paul (b Nuremberg, bap. 16 Nov 1569; d Innsbruck, 28 Feb 1609). German composer and organist. He was originally called Schneider. In his native city he attended the grammar school of St Lorenz, where one of his teachers was Leonhard Lechner. Then, as he explained in the preface to his Neue teutsche Liedlein, he went to Italy to study with some of the famous composers of the day. He probably stayed for quite some time in Rome in circles frequented by Palestrina and his pupils; one composer he probably got to know well was Ruggiero Giovannelli, on whose motet Jubilate Deo omnis terra he wrote a parody mass. By 1594 at the latest he became organist in the Hofkapelle of Archduke Maximilian II of Austria, and he held this post until his death. The archduke lived at Mergentheim, Franconia, until 1602 and thereafter at Innsbruck, and thus Sartorius must have lived principally at these two places. In 1599 he sent one of his eight-part masses to Duke Maximilian I of Bavaria at Munich and at about the same time sent his eight six-part Magnificat settings and some motets to Archbishop Wolf Dietrich von Raitenau at Salzburg. It is out of the question that his permanent home was at Nuremberg, as Eitner supposed; Eitner and some later authorities also wrongly identified him with the Nuremberg pastor Paul Sartorius (1561–1623); nor was he related to the Nuremberg music publisher Johann Friedrich Sartorius (*c*1595–after 1649).

For a German composer of Hassler's generation, Sartorius was, as a composer of sacred vocal works, very much up-to-date in his knowledge of Italian music. He was influenced less by Lassus or Hassler than he was by Palestrina. This is particularly evident in the eight six-part Magnificat settings, in which he made use not only of single motifs, but even here and there of whole passages taken from Magnificat settings by Palestrina. He set only the even-numbered verses, beginning with 'Et exsultavit', and created the impression of a real eight-part double choir by the use of contrasting groups of four voices from the full choir. His German songs are almost entirely in duple time and mainly use pavane and allemande rhythms, with primarily imitative textures and much sequential writing. In form and content they are midway between the sophisticated art of the canzonet and the simple dance-song.

FRANZ KRAUTWURST

Sartory, Eugène (b Mirecourt, 22 Sept 1871; d Paris, 5 March 1946). French bowmaker. He received his first training from his father. He went to Paris to work first for Charles Peccatte and then for Alfred Lamy before setting up on his own account in 1893. He worked first at 12 boulevard Bonne Nouvelle, moving to 13 rue du Faubourg Poissonnière and finally to 3 Cité Trévise. His work was much influenced by Voirin and Lamy but has marginally more strength, both in the hand and to the eye. The bows' heads are small and the sticks most often round; the best are dark brown. The cello bows usually depart from the Voirin tradition, having more weight and a broader head. At the beginning of the 20th century Sartory's bows retailed in London at two guineas, less than an inferior brand from Dresden. He was soon better appreciated, however, and among his patrons was Ysaÿe, who had several presentation bows made. His bows are very popular today; the brandmark, 'E. Sartory à Paris', appears on the handle and also often under the lapping. For further information, see J. Roda: Bows for Musical Instruments of the Violin Family (Chicago, 1959).

CHARLES BEARE

Sarum chant. See SALISBURY, USE OF.

Sarunai [sarinai, sarune, sarunei, serunai, serune]. Oboe of Sumatra, Malaysia and Vietnam; a double-reed instrument with pirouette, related to the Arab zūrnā. It exists in various forms, for all of which circular breathing is used.

In Minangkabau, West Sumatra, the sarunai consists of a double reed of palm-leaf lamellae below which is a wooden or metal ring, two conically bored pipes fitting vertically into each other, with four fingerholes in the lower pipe, and a buffalo-horn or wooden flare. Alternatively a piece of rice-stalk about 8 cm long is fitted into an open thin piece of bamboo about 23 cm long; a U-shaped slit is cut in the top of the stalk to serve as a reed and four fingerholes are cut into the bamboo tube.

In the Batak Toba area the sarune occurs in two sizes. The larger (80 cm long) is used only in the ceremonial gondang orchestra and the smaller (sarune getep, 30 cm long) in ceremonial ensembles. The former has a tiny double reed of palm-leaf lamellae, which fits through a coconut shell or metal disc into the body – a wooden pipe with four fingerholes, a piece of buffalo horn and another piece of wooden pipe, ending with a wooden circle or goat-horn flare. The smaller instrument has a body of three cylindrically or conically bored pieces of wood.

In the Pakpak (Dairi) area the sarune is made entirely of wood, with a tubular body, about 40 cm long, ending in a barrel-shaped bell. It has six fingerholes and a tiny double reed of palm leaf. It is played in the genderang ensemble at large festivals, and in ceremonies involving magic it is played solo.

In the Batak Simalungun area the sarunei is used in the gonrang sidua-dua and gonrang sipitu-pitu ceremonial ensembles. Its double reed (anak ni sarunei: 'child of the sarunei') is made of a folded grass blade and its flared body of wood or bamboo. It has six fingerholes and a thumb-hole.

In the Mandailing area the sarune (about 25 to 30 cm long) comprises a palm-leaf double reed, a vertical disc of metal or shell, a cylindrical body of bulo surik (a kind of bamboo) in which four finger-holes are cut or burnt out, and a flare of goat horn at the bottom. The mouthpiece is usually attached by a small piece of string to the pipe into which it is inserted. The sarune plays an ornamented melodic line in the three main Mandailing ceremonial orchestras.

In the Batak Karo area the saruné plays the leading melodic role in the gendang ensemble. Its conical body, about 25 cm long, is made of silantam wood and ends with a carved flare. Its double reed, called anak saruné, is made of green coconut leaf; the disc below it is of metal. It has eight fingerholes.

In the Gayo (Takengon) area of Central Aceh the serune has a pipe of jackfruit wood about 24 cm long. It has a slightly conical bore and ends in a conical flare made of wound strips of pandan palm leaf about 13 cm long and 3 cm in diameter at its lower end. The pipe has usually six fingerholes in the front and one at the back. To the double reed, made of rumbia palm leaf, is attached a piece of coconut shell which fits the blown-out cheeks of the player. Another form of the instrument in Aceh is known as a seurune kaleë.

In the Serdang, Langkat and other Malay coastal areas of North Sumatra the small palm-leaf reeds of the serunai fit into a bamboo tube, with one or two coconut-shell or metal rings near the mouthpiece, to which a long wooden or bamboo tube with a slightly conical bore is attached, ending in a flare. It is used in the gendang-gung and makyong ensembles in Serdang.

In West Malaysia, the serunai has a double reed, usually of palm leaf, attached with a metal staple to the upper end of a slightly conical wooden tube, which ends in a wide, circular bell with little flare. There is a pirouette of copper or other metal, and the reed is taken into the mouth completely. There are usually seven fingerholes and a single thumb-hole. The instrument is found in two sizes, the smaller (about 40 cm long) being more popular than the larger which may be up to 50 cm long. The instrument may be decorated and inlaid with mother-of-pearl. It is used to accompany theatre genres and folkdances. The serunai of the Semelai Orang Asli (aborigines) is an end-blown bamboo tube about 23 cm long, with a piece of grass wedged in one end to form a reed.

The saranai ('xaranai') is an oboe used by the Chàm people living in south-central Vietnam. The lowland Vietnamese counterpart is called kèn bầu, kèn bóp, or kèn mộc. The saranai, about 35 cm long, consists of three parts: a double reed, connecting tube and main body. There are seven fingerholes and one thumb-hole under the body. Its active, conjunct melodic style uses equidistant pentatonic and heptatonic scales. The Chàm instrument is accompanied by the baranu'ng, a single-headed drum played with the hands.

MARGARET J. KARTOMI, LYN MOORE, NGUYEN THUYET PHONG (with JACK PERCIVAL BAKER DOBBS)

Sáry, László (b Györ, 1 Jan 1940). Hungarian composer, brother of József Sári. He studied with Szervánszky at the Liszt Academy of Music, Budapest (1961–6). His early works show the strong influence of Bartók. In ensuing years, acquaintance with the music of Boulez and Stockhausen stimulated a change in his style. The experimental ideas he developed with the Budapest New Music Studio (which he co-founded in 1970 with Jeney and Vidovszky, among others), led to group improvisation and collective compositions, of which Pentagram (1982) is an adaptation. His encounter with Christian Wolff at Darmstadt in 1972 led him to diverge further from traditional Western European styles. Much of his music of the 1970s and 80s employs repetitive patterns, such as chordal sequences (A Continuity of Rotative Chords), groups of scales (Ludus cromaticus) or small sets of pitches (Fives Repeated, made up of 120 permutations of five pitches). His interest in electronics and musique concrète led to Studies for Steam Engines (tape, 1996), which won third prize in the seventh International Rostrum of Electroacoustic Music (1998).

In the mid-1970s, Sáry began formulating 'Creative Music Practice', which explores improvisation in teaching and composing; he has introduced this method to music teachers in Japan, France, Italy, Belgium and Estonia. His book on the subject, Kreatív zenei gyakolatok ('Creative music activities'), was published in 1999.

RACHEL BECKLES WILLSON

Saryan, Ghazaros (Lazar) Martirosi (b Rostov-na-Donu, 30 Sept 1920; d Yerevan, 27 May 1998). Armenian composer and teacher. He was the son of the painter Martiros Saryan who moved with his family to Yerevan in 1921. Ghazaros Saryan studied composition with Barkhudarian and Talian at the Yerevan Conservatory (1934–8) and then with Anatoly Aleksandrov and Shostakovich at the Moscow Conservatory (1945–50). He then taught composition and orchestration at the Yerevan Conservatory (from 1972 as professor), also serving there as rector (1960–86) and head of composition (from 1986). His pupils include Tigran Mansurian. He was chairman of the board of the Armenian Composers' Union (1955–6) and received many official awards including the State Prize of Armenia (1983, for his Symphony) and People's Artist of the USSR (1990). His works have been performed internationally. His musical orientation is broadly programmatic. In his early works national colouring and elements of folklore are combined to create a picturesque but sometimes ascetic thinking; the orchestral suite Panno Armenia ('Symphonic Canvas of Armenia') vividly recreates in musical terms the paintings of the composer's father, even if their sonic manifestation is at times rather abstract. His increasing interest in timbral gradation and spatial perspective is demonstrated in the Symphony (1980) in which, through subtly differentiated use of nuance, Saryan creates dense and at times pointilliste textural landscapes. In a number of works he employs 12-tone technique (Violin Concerto and Second String Quartet) but he also uses pre-Classical techniques such as ostinato, monothematicism and textural narration; in the orchestral Passacaglia, this traditional form is reinterpreted in the light of pantonal harmonic devices.

SVETLANA SARKISYAN

Sas (Orchassal), Andrés (b Paris, 6 April 1900; d Lima, 26 Aug 1967). Peruvian musicologist and composer of Belgian-French origin. When he was five the family moved to Brussels, where until 1919, under parental pressure, he studied to be a chemical engineer. But in 1920 he completed a course in harmony at the Anderlecht Academy, Brussels, and he then studied at the Brussels Conservatory with Marchot (violin, 1920), Miry (chamber music, 1923) and Closson (history), taking private lessons in counterpoint and fugue under Imbert. After a year of teaching at the Forest Music School, Brussels, he was in 1924 appointed to teach the violin and chamber music at the Lima Academy. He was back in Belgium to direct the municipal music school in Ninove (1928–9), and then returned to Lima, where, with his wife, the pianist Lily Rosay, he founded the Sas–Rosay Academy of Music (1930). Also in that year he collaborated with María Wiesse de Sabogal in founding Antara, a short-lived Lima music journal named after the Inca syrinx. Stimulated by the work of Max Uhle, Sas was the first Peruvian to make a scientific study of the clay syrinxes of the Nazca, a pre-Inca coastal tribe, and he established the microtonal nature of their music. He co-edited three further journals: El correo de insula (1946), Anacrusa (1956) and Música (1957). Although none of these lasted more than a few months, Sas's articles on colonial music established him as the leading historian of Peruvian music in Lima. He directed the conservatory there in 1951, continuing to teach composition and theory sporadically until 1966. His pupils included Garrido-Lecca, Iturriaga, Pinilla, Pulgar Vidal and Edgard Valcárcel. As a composer himself he treated Peruvian materials in an Impressionist manner, producing salon pieces based on the pentatonic highland melodies.

Sasse [Sax, Saxe, Sass], Marie (Constance) (b Oudenaarde, 26 Jan 1834; d Paris, 8 Nov 1907). Belgian soprano. She studied in Ghent, Paris and Milan and made her début at Venice as Gilda in 1852. At the outset of her career she changed her name to Sax, then to Saxe when the instrument maker Adolphe sued her; when he sued again, she reverted to Sasse and was later known as Sass. While working in Paris as a café-concert singer she came to the notice of Carvalho, director of the Théâtre Lyrique, where she appeared as Countess Almaviva in Figaro in 1859. In the same year, she sang Eurydice in the historic revival of Gluck's Orphée et Eurydice, in Berlioz's version, with Viardot as Orpheus. Engaged at the Paris Opéra from 1860 to 1877, she sang Elisabeth in the revised Tannhäuser (1861), and created Sélika in L'Africaine (1865) and Elisabeth de Valois in Don Carlos (1867). Her repertory also included Valentine (Les Huguenots), Alice (Robert le diable) and Leonora (Il trovatore). At La Scala she created Cecilia in Gomes's Il Guarany (1870) and sang Lucrezia Borgia (1877). She also appeared in Brussels, St Petersburg and Madrid. Wagner was pleased with her Elisabeth in Tannhäuser; Verdi, who disliked her attitude to colleagues at rehearsal, was less pleased with her heroine in Don Carlos. When she was recommended for Amneris in Aida, he refused. Married, briefly, to the bass Armand Castelmary, she retired in 1877 and died in poverty. Her memoirs, Souvenirs d'une artiste, were published in Paris in 1902.

Sassetti. Portuguese firm of music publishers and retailers. It was founded in Lisbon in 1848 as Sassetti & Co. by João Baptista Sassetti (1817–89), and published educational works, classical choral and piano music, and works by Portuguese composers (e.g. João Arroio, Luís de Freitas Branco, Cláudio Carneyro, Rui Coelho, Rey Colaço, Armando José Fernandes, Frederico de Freitas, Victor Hussla, Alfredo Keil and José Vianna da Motta). In 1973 Sassetti & Co. started a new company, Sassetti-Sociedade Portuguese de Música e Som, which is involved in the manufacture of records and music, also handling its own sales; it specializes in records, and its programme includes the systematic recording of works by major Portuguese composers (e.g. Carlos Seixas, João Domingos Bomtempo, Fernando Lopes Graça, Jorge Peixinho and Emanuel Nunes). Sassetti & Co. continued as an independent retail business until the mid-1980s when it ceased almost all activities; it now publishes reprints only.

Śāstri, Śyāma (b Tiruvarur, Tamil Nadu, 26 April 1792; d Thanjavur, Tamil Nadu, 6 Feb 1827). South Indian composer and musician. He was the oldest member of the Karnatak trimūrti ('trinity') of singer-saints (see also TYĀGARĀJA and MUTTUSVĀMI DĪKṢITAR). His family was not musical but he was taught Telugu and Sanskrit by his father, who was the pūjāri at the Kāmākṣi temple in Thanjavur. Śyāma Śāstri received his musical training initially from a wandering sannyāsin, Saṅgīta Svāmī, and later from Paccimiriyam Ādiyappayya. Although, like the other two members of the 'trinity', Śyāma Śāstri eschewed royal patronage in favour of a life of devotion, his financial position was secure due to his inheritance of land, originally granted to his father by the ruler of Thanjavur in 1783. One request he did accede to, however, was to sing against the Andhran musician Bobbili Keśaviaya, who had issued a musical challenge to the court musicians at Thanjavur.

Devotion was the primary aim of his music-making, inspired by the Hindu bhakti revivalism of the 18th century. He worshipped the goddesses Kāmākṣi, to whom many of his compositions were addressed, and it is possible that he initiated Muttusvāmi Dīkṣitar into Devi bhakti. His output is smaller than Tyāgarāja's (traditionally said to be around 300 pieces, many of which are now lost), but it is generally considered to be extremely fine and rhythmically intricate; his use of tāla is widely admired. Śyāma Śāstri's texts were largely composed in Telugu, widening their popular appeal. Some of his most famous compositions include the nine kriti, Navaratnamālikā, in praise of the goddess Mīnākṣī at Madurai, and his eighteen kriti in praise of Kāmākṣi. As well as composing kriti, he is credited with turning the svarajati, originally used for dance, into a purely musical form (his three svarajati in rāga Tōḍi, Bhairavī and Edukulakāmbhōji are all devotional songs to Kāmākṣi).

Satanowski, Robert (b Łódź, 20 June 1918). Polish conductor and composer. He studied conducting in Łódź under Bohdan Wodiczko and gained his diploma in 1951; that year he became conductor of the Lublin PO. After working as conductor and artistic director of the State PO in Bydgoszcz, he studied opera production with Felsenstein at the Komische Oper in Berlin and also with Karajan, before becoming artistic director of the city theatre and conductor of opera and operetta in Karl-Marx-Stadt (now Chemnitz). From 1961 to 1963 he was conductor, artistic director and director of the Poznań PO. He founded the Poznań Chamber Orchestra and was conductor of the Poznań Opera, 1963–5. From 1969 to 1976 he was artistic director of the Vereinigte Städtische Bühnen of Krefeld and Mönchengladbach. From 1975 to 1977 he was conductor and artistic director of the Municipal Music Theatre in Kraków, and from 1977 to 1982 conductor of the Wrocław Opera, before becoming artistic director at the Warsaw Opera (1981–91) and conductor of the Aachen Opera (1991–2). Satanowski was a guest conductor at opera houses throughout Europe and in the USA, and also conducted in Iran and Turkey. He gave the premières of works by Witold Rudzinski, Edward Bogusławski and Zbigniew Bargielski. Among his own compositions are an Allegro symfoniczne, a string quartet, piano and choral works, songs and dramatic music.

Satie, Erik [Eric] (Alfred Leslie) (b Honfleur, 17 May 1866; d Paris, 1 July 1925). French composer. He was an iconoclast, a man of ideas who looked constantly towards the future. Debussy christened him 'the precursor' because of his early harmonic innovations, though he surpassed his friend's conception of him by anticipating most of the 'advances' of 20th-century music – from organized total chromaticism to minimalism. To some extent he made a virtue of his technical limitations, but his painstaking quest for perfection in simplicity, coupled with his ironic wit and his shrewd awareness of developments in other fields of contemporary art, made him the personification of the wartime esprit nouveau in France.

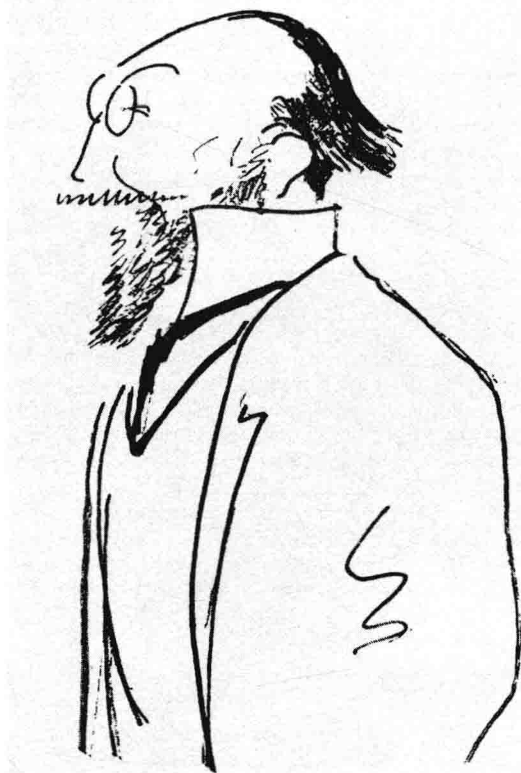
1. LIFE. He was the eldest son of Alfred Satie and Jane Leslie Anton, whose mother was Scottish. After the Franco-Prussian war, Alfred sold his ship-broking business and the family moved to Paris, but in 1872, Jane Satie died and Eric and his brother Conrad were sent back to Honfleur to be brought up, as Catholics, by Alfred's parents. Here Eric (who, as a professional composer, later used 'Erik') began music lessons in 1874 with a local organist, Vinot, who stimulated his love of Gregorian chant. Disaster struck again in the summer of 1878 when his grandmother mysteriously drowned, and he was returned to Paris to be informally educated by his father. Meanwhile his father had met a piano teacher and mediocre salon composer, Eugénie Barnetche, and in January 1879 they married, much to Eric's displeasure. Eugénie resolved to form Eric in her own mould and enrolled him in the preparatory piano class of Émile Descombes at the Paris Conservatoire that November.

Satie loathed his seven years at what he later called 'a sort of local penitentiary' and was described by Descombes in 1881 as the 'laziest student in the Conservatoire'. Almost every report suggests that he was a gifted pianist who was utterly lacking in motivation and poor at sight-reading. By 1885 he had reached the intermediate piano class of Eugénie's former teacher, Georges Mathias, who also thought him 'worthless'. His closest friend at the time, the Spanish-born poet Contamine de Latour, maintained that he only persisted with his Conservatoire studies so that he could get away with one year's military service instead of five. In the end, he reduced this still further by deliberately contracting bronchitis to get himself invalided out of the 33rd Infantry Regiment in April 1887.

During his convalescence he discovered the literary works of Flaubert and Péladan. His father, who had set up his own music publishing business in 1883, brought out five songs he had written with Latour, and his Valse-ballet and Fantaisie-valse appeared in the journal La musique des familles. Despite these attempts to fit in with the bourgeois musical aspirations of his parents, relationships were becoming increasingly strained, and he left home late in 1887 to begin an independent career in Montmartre.



His first room, at 50 rue Condorcet, was close to the famous Chat Noir cabaret, where he soon became a frequent habitué. He (and Latour) were introduced to the colourful master of ceremonies, Rodolphe Salis, by the plumber-turned-poet Vital-Hoquet. Satie impressively styled himself 'Erik Satie – gymnopédiste', although his three celebrated Gymnopédies were not completed until the spring of 1888. Free from his restrictive upbringing, he enthusiastically embraced the reckless bohemian lifestyle and created for himself a new persona as a long-haired man-about-town in frock coat and top hat. By 1890 he was engaged as conductor of the orchestra that accompanied Henri Rivière's shadow theatre spectacles at the Chat Noir; there he was soon on familiar terms with the humorist Alphonse Allais, whose whimsical buffoonery influenced his own pseudonymous early journalism. In 1891 he quarrelled with Salis and left the Chat Noir to become second pianist at the nearby Auberge du Clou. Here his friendship with Debussy developed, especially when Debussy was the only one to recognize the serious intent behind the outrageous 'Christian ballet' Uspud, which Satie and Latour had concocted to scandalize the musical establishment (even challenging the director of the Paris Opéra to a duel in order to gain Uspud a hearing). Debussy's perceptive description of Satie as 'a gentle medieval musician lost in this century' also dates from 1892, though their intimate 25-year friendship was not without its complications, especially when Satie the jester later became successful and challenged Debussy's musical superiority.

In the spring of 1890 Satie moved higher up into the Butte Montmartre 'to escape his creditors', and his Rose+Croix compositions were conceived in tiny rooms at 6 rue Cortot. His aims during this fascinating period were to create a new musical style from the limited technical means at his disposal, and to make his name widely known. His association with the flamboyant, self-styled 'Sâr' Joséphin Péladan during 1891–2 helped in both respects: as the official composer for Péladan's spurious Ordre de la Rose-Croix Catholique du Temple et du Graal, he was allowed free rein to experiment, and Péladan's Rosicrucian Salons at the fashionable Galerie Durand-Ruel gained him his first public hearings. In the process he developed his interests in mystical religion and Gothic art, and in Le fils des étoiles invented 'static sound décor': incidental music that pursued a self-sufficient course oblivious to its theatrical surroundings.

In August 1892 he publicly broke off relations with Péladan, and between 1893 and 1895 became the founder (and only member) of the Église Métropolitaine d'Art de Jésus Conducteur. From his 'Abbatiale' in the rue Cortot, he published scathing attacks on his artistic enemies – attacks which show signs of paranoia. He made three attempts to gain election to the Académie des Beaux-Arts, underwent his only known (and traumatic) love-affair with his neighbour, the painter Suzanne Valadon, in 1893, and changed his appearance again to that of the 'Velvet Gentleman' by buying seven identical dun-coloured suits with part of a small inheritance in 1895 (fig.1). This change, together with the collection of movements that form the Messe des pauvres, marked the end of his Rose+Croix period and the start of a long search for a new artistic direction.

Satie also needed somewhere even cheaper and less distracting in which to live and work, and to this end he moved to the southern suburb of Arcueil at the end of 1898. Once installed, he closed his door to the world for the rest of his life, adopting his final appearance as a respectable, deferential bourgeois functionary (with bowler hat, wing collar and umbrella) in 1905. He walked the ten kilometres into Paris every day, stopping at numerous cafés en route to drink and compose, returning in the small hours either by the last train from Montparnasse or on foot. In wet weather (which he preferred) he shielded his ubiquitous umbrella beneath his coat, which also contained a hammer to repel potential assailants. The unsolved question is how he emerged from his filthy room each day in pristine condition, 'like an actor stepping out from the wings' (Shattuck).

To earn a living he returned regularly to the café-concerts of Montmartre as accompanist to Vincent Hyspa, although he had greater commercial success with his songs for Paulette Darty (the 'Queen of the Slow Waltz') after 1902. He worked on various theatrical entertainments with Latour and Jules Dépaquit, and in The Dreamy Fish he tried mixing a jaunty music-hall style with the 'Impressionistic' harmonies of his friend Debussy. But what he called the 'absolutely astounding' revelation of Pélleas et Mélisande in 1902 showed him that this was an artistic cul-de-sac, and the only significant product of these unhappy, directionless years were the Trois morceaux en forme de poire of 1903, although these were a mixture of pieces written in 1890–91 with arrangements of more recent cabaret songs.

In a determined attempt to improve his technique, Satie enrolled as a mature student at the Schola Cantorum in October 1905, gaining a diploma in counterpoint (under Roussel) in 1908, and taking various parts of d'Indy's composition course (including fugue and orchestration) between 1905 and 1912. Now that he was self-motivated, his progress was more impressive, although by no means exceptional. His compositional offshoots show that he still retained his sense of parody, and his main aim seems to have been to develop a modern form of fugue, using short-winded, elliptical subjects (as in the 'Fugue litanique' from En habit de cheval).

The turning-point in his career came in January 1911 when Ravel performed some of his earliest pieces at a concert of the Société Musicale Indépendante. Satie was suddenly seen (in his second Sarabande) as a harmonic forerunner of Impressionism: he became a focus for young composers, and Debussy conducted his orchestrations of the Gymnopédies two months later at the Salle Gaveau, upsetting their composer by being jealous of their success. What pleased Satie most about all this was that Demets agreed to publish his recent Véritables préludes flasques in 1912 and was soon requesting more such humorous piano pieces. This enabled him to give up his 'degrading' cabaret work and stimulated a productive period that culminated in the Sports et divertissements of 1914, in which his exquisitely calligraphed texts and music combined with Charles Martin's drawings in a miniature Gesamtkunstwerk. Articles began to appear about his music, and the celebrated pianist Viñes promoted his cause with some notable first performances.

Though World War I interrupted the flow of concerts and publications somewhat, this period also brought Satie's second lucky break when Cocteau heard Viñes and Satie perform the Trois morceaux in 1916. With his abundant energy and high society contacts, Cocteau was able to open doors for Satie, leading to the Diaghilev-Massine-Picasso ballet Parade in 1917. After this succès de scandale, Satie's career revolved around the theatre and he found himself in the fortunate position of writing mostly to commission. If he preferred working with Picasso, and had a greater respect for Diaghilev than for Cocteau (whom he came to find interfering and egoistic), it was the latter's championship of him – especially in Le coq et l'arlequin and as godfather to Les Six – that ensured his fame in the postwar years.

In October 1916 Satie received a commission from the Princesse de Polignac that was to result in his masterpiece, Socrate, two years later. He chose to set extracts from Plato's Dialogues in a translation by Victor Cousin as a 'symphonic drama', though one 'without the least idea of conflict'. Satie called it a 'return to classical simplicity with a modern sensibility', and it greatly impressed Stravinsky when he heard it in 1919. Its composition was, however, interrupted in 1917 by the successful libel case brought against him in the wake of Parade by the critic Jean Poueigh, when he only narrowly escaped a prison sentence.

After 1920 his journalistic output increased. During that year there were two festivals of his music and the first performance, with Milhaud, of Musique d'ameublement (music designed to be, like furniture, part of the background) at the Galerie Barbazanges. In 1921 Satie joined the Communist party and began to become increasingly involved in the Dada movement in Paris; he presided at the public trial of André Breton at the Closerie des Lilas café in February 1922. In 1923 a group of young composers (Cliquet-Pleyel, Désormière, Jacob and Sauguet) adopted him as their mascot, and he promoted the 'École d'Arcueil' in concerts even after he became intensely occupied in setting the spoken dialogue from Gounod's opera Le médecin malgré lui at Diaghilev's request for his winter season in Monte Carlo. (This score showed that he was perfectly capable of using directional, 19th-century chromatic harmony when he chose to.) 1924 proved even more eventful with the ballets Mercure (Picasso-Massine) and Relâche (Picabia-Borlin), both of which provoked first night scandals. Relâche, with its onstage obscenities, anticipated the theatre of alienation, though its most significant part was René Clair's surrealist film Entr'acte (fig.3), for which Satie composed the first synchronized film score.

After Relâche Satie's years of heavy drinking finally caught up with him, and he had to be hospitalized in February 1925 due to cirrhosis of the liver and pleurisy. He remained uncompromising to the end, refusing to see past friends with whom he had quarrelled. When his brother Conrad, Milhaud, Désormière and Robert Caby finally entered his squalid room in Arcueil, they had to evict two cartloads of accumulated rubbish before they could begin to sort out his papers and manuscripts. The letters he had kept were unfortunately later destroyed in a fire at Conrad's home, but his notebooks and scores were preserved by Milhaud.

2. WORKS. There are so many conflicting interpretations of Satie's career that it may best be viewed as a single span – one whose unconventional direction was determined by a continual rethinking of the aims and aesthetics of music in reaction to 19th-century practice and excesses. Dance, theatre and cabaret music run as virtually continuous threads through this span, as do the cardinal French virtues of simplicity, brevity and precision. If a dividing line has to be drawn, it should be with the move to Arcueil in 1898.

Just as there is no motivic development in Satie's oeuvre, or any sense of harmonic direction towards a climax, so his style as a whole does not develop in any conventional sense. In many ways the 1887 Sarabandes are more sophisticated harmonically than his final ballet Relâche, and his genius lay rather in his capacity for constant renewal and experimentation within a limited textural range. His harmonic ear was his greatest gift, though his work gained greater strength through the sparser, more contrapuntal approach he adopted after his years at the Schola Cantorum. Curiously, rhythmic originality never seemed to concern him.

When considering any piece by Satie, the following key passages from his compositional aesthetic (formulated retrospectively in 1917) should be borne in mind:

> Do not forget that the melody is the Idea, the outline; as much as it is the form and the subject matter of a work. The harmony is an illumination, an exhibition of the object, its reflection . . . If there is form and a new style of writing, there is a new craft . . . Great Masters are brilliant through their ideas, their craft is a simple means to an end, nothing more. It is their ideas which endure . . . The Idea can do without Art.

This principle can already be seen operating in Satie's earliest important composition, the four barless Ogives of 1886 (ex.1). In each piece the controlling Idea is a single melodic line (A) written in the spirit of medieval plainsong. There are two harmonizations (or illuminations), the first (A1) in ff parallel octaves using alternating root position chords and inversions, the second (A2) entirely in pp root position chords. The form is A–A1–A2–A1, and the only real 'Art' applied to this first compositional system is that there are between one and four chordal changes from A1 to A2 in each Ogive. As in many of Satie's early compositional sets, the concept is timeless and spatial, as if the same sculpture were being viewed from different angles. Through repetition Satie makes a lot out of a little; the craft is certainly a simple means to an end, and both the style of writing and the concept were entirely new.

In the three Sarabandes of 1887, Satie made his first experiment in juxtaposing musical cells within the binary form (with repeated halves) of a baroque dance movement. The uncompromising harmonic vocabulary (chains of unresolved 7ths and 9ths) undoubtedly influenced Debussy's 1894 Sarabande, and probably came about as an extension of similar progressions in the barless song Sylvie rather than from the functional parallel 9ths that Satie had recently heard in Chabrier's prelude to Le roi malgré lui. The gently undulating Gymnopédies belong to a different antique world and rightly remain among Satie's most popular creations: lilting, modal and never quite predictable. Satie claimed that they were inspired by reading Flaubert's Salammbô. The three Gnossiennes of 1890 acquire a more oriental feeling through their modal use of the raised fourth degree, their melodic decorations and their more static basslines. For the first time Satie added occasional strange comments to challenge the preconceptions of performers and to stimulate their interest.

In the Rose+Croix pieces of 1891–5 he moved forward from the Ogives, endlessly experimenting in his search for a perfect compositional system. While the end-products are uniformly slow, hieratic, modal and detached from their bizarre titles, the thought behind them is way ahead of its time. Golden section proportioning is frequent; the recurring cadences in the two Préludes du Nazaréen create a musical punctuation adapted from literature; and Vexations (1893) is both the first organized piece of total chromaticism, on a hexachordal basis, and the first minimalist piece, with a period of silent meditation before the 840 repetitions of the short, self-repeating chordal chain that follow. Uspud represents an early experiment in the theatre of the absurd; its text was the first to be published entirely in lower case. The best pieces of this period, such as the prelude to Jules Bois' esoteric drama La porte héroïque du ciel or the Eginhard prelude, are exquisite miniatures; the most abstruse – among them Salut Drapeau!, one of several experiments in using the Greek chromatic mode – remain intricately conceived curiosities.

After the move to Arcueil, Satie's career appeared to bifurcate, and however much he professed to despise his café-concert work, it was already fertilizing his 'serious' compositions by 1903. The error that prevented him from finding a new way forward before 1912 was partly that of trying to ape his illustrious peers, for we find bits of Ravel in his miniature opera Geneviève de Brabant and echoes of both Fauré and Debussy in the Nouvelles pièces froides of 1907. An earlier following-up of the economical and fluid piano style that appears in the Pièces froides of 1897 could have saved him a lot of soul-searching – but then he might never have gone to the Schola Cantorum or produced a gem like Le Piccadilly, one of the earliest French experiments in ragtime. Like many of his pieces from the 1884 Allegro to the 'Ragtime du paquebot' (the 'Titanic') in Parade, Le Piccadilly has a popular model – in this case the phone-call chorus from Hello! Ma Baby by Howard and Emerson (1899). If Satie can seem like Henri 'Douanier' Rousseau in this respect, he could also anticipate popular melodies, whether 'Tea for Two' in 'Le golf' (from the Sports et divertissements) or 'Run, rabbit, run' in The Dreamy Fish, both ostensibly 'serious' compositions. His original cabaret songs, like Je te veux and La diva de l'Empire, are catchy and well-crafted, with unexpected harmonic twists, and his scorings for small cabaret orchestra in the 1900s set the pattern for his later orchestrations, which are characterized by conservative instrumental ranges, the absence of any doublings at the same pitch, and an almost continual mixture of separately articulated strings and wind.

If Satie's years at the Schola Cantorum stimulated his taste for sectionally conceived fugues and dissonant chorales, it was his sudden success in 1911 that made him revert to a single, all-embracing track. Humorous piano sets rolled off what became almost a production line in 1912–15, their eccentric titles and literary diversions showing the renewed and endlessly inventive mind of Satie the 'phonometrogapher'. As well as foreshadowing surrealism in the Heures séculaires et instantanées (and in the play Le piège de Méduse, where the Baron Méduse is a self-portrait), he for once also looked to the past. The inconsequential Rossinian development section is parodied in 'd'holothurie' from the Embryons desséchés, in the section marked 'like a nightingale with toothache', while the whole piece is both a rethinking of the implications of sonata form and an adaption of Loïsa Puget's popular song Mon rocher de St Malo. A marvellously flat and unromantic version of the trio theme from Chopin's Funeral March bears the brunt of Satie's devastating wit in 'd'edriophthalma', and in the coda of 'de podophthalma' Beethoven's Eighth Symphony is the victim of what must be one of the funniest afterthoughts in music. Like the Rose+Croix music, these pieces are barless, but the tempos now are much more varied, and as Satie forbade their commentaries to be read aloud in public performance, they are essentially meant for private consumption, with the focus on novel graphic presentation reaching its peak in the Sports et divertissements. As always, the pieces were assembled like a jigsaw puzzle from an assortment of short 'motifs' with an emphasis on abrupt contrast, an almost Brahmsian fondness for low bass octaves, and a logic that was explicable only to the composer. Many experiments were left unpublished, again for reasons that can only be guessed at, but Satie had an unerring awareness of what was right for a particular time, and quickly lost interest in his past compositions.

During the last decade of his career, the commissions that came after his second discovery by Cocteau enabled him to diversify his output. He produced four sets of miniature songs, of which the finest (and least known) are the Quatre petites mélodies of 1920, which open with a uniquely personal and anguished 'Élégie' for Debussy. He continued writing piano pieces up to the same year, anticipating Stravinskian neo-classicism in the Sonatine bureaucratique (an adaptation of Clementi's Sonatina, op.36 no.1), and returning to systematic composition (based on intervals) in the Nocturnes. Altogether he collaborated on five theatre works with Cocteau, three with Picasso (fig.4) and three with the choreographer Massine, and from Parade onwards he worked mainly for Dyaghilev's Ballets Russes, devising no fewer than six ballet projects for them, four of these with the painter Derain. His attraction to analytical cubism surely inspired the block-like orchestral juxtapositions of Parade, just as its noise-making instruments (typewriters, revolvers, etc.) can be compared to the use of everyday objects in synthetic cubism. This epoch-making ballet, whose unchanging pulse is that of the human heartbeat, put Satie into the forefront of the avant garde and from then on his primary aim was to make his music chic, Parisian and shocking. His final anarchic ballets, Mercure and Relâche, show a similar concern with mirrored structuring through interrelated sections, though their stylized music-hall content is less impressive.

Among the works of these later years, Socrate stands out as Satie's main claim on seriousness. It is the ultimate example of Apollinaire's 'cult of restraint' and, in contrast to Parade, displays a linear logic in the succession of motifs and a more horizontal, continuous approach. Satie aimed to make Socrate 'white and pure like antiquity', and its complete absence of rhetoric and almost monochrome simplicity invite the sensitive listener to enter its interiorized world, where the slightest nuance is significant. In a sense, its detachment returns to the 'static sound décor' of the Rose+Croix period, and at one stage Satie even likened it to his contemporary 'furniture music'.

During his lifetime Satie exerted an important influence on Debussy, Ravel and the young composers of Les Six, while being very little influenced himself. After his death he was predictably vilified by those he had alienated through his explosive rages and seemingly irrational behaviour, and his subsequent restoration to cult status in the 1960s was validated by John Cage, who mounted concerts of his works and declared him 'indispensable' to the development of contemporary music. Many later composers in Britain and the United States have drawn on Satie's ideas in their work, and this living tradition has also been stimulated by surrealist artists like Magritte, Man Ray and Miró, with perspicacious critical support from writers such as Wilfrid Mellers, Roger Shattuck and Ornella Volta. Happily it shows no signs of abating.

WORKS

The following list includes all the pieces Satie chose to publish, all those published by Milhaud shortly after his death and unpublished complete surviving pieces to which he gave titles. In the years around 1968 Robert Caby edited and published a number of sketches and drafts, mostly from the Schola Cantorum period (1905–12), of which only those titled and completed by Satie have been included. Where these printings have been superseded by a modern critical edition, the publication date of the latter is also given. The cabaret songs from the period 1897–1909 are difficult to date precisely, and only original songs completed by Satie are listed. Publications emanated from Paris unless otherwise specified.

ROBERT ORLEDGE

Satō, Eishi. See KIKKAWA, EISHI.

Satoh, Toyohiko (b Hiroshima, 4 Nov 1943). Japanese lutenist and composer. He studied at Rikkio University, Tokyo, and with Eugen Dombois at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis. He made his début in 1969 in Basle, and although he has since made a special study of Baroque music (lightly strung Baroque lute, chitarrone and theorbo) he also plays 16th-century music (lute and vihuela). Satoh has made some admired and influential recordings of Baroque music. He teaches at The Hague Royal Conservatory. His own compositions, several of which have been recorded, include works for lute and choral music.

Sattner, Hugolin (b Kandija, nr Novo Mesto, 29 Nov 1851; d Ljubljana, 20 April 1934). Slovenian composer. He joined the Franciscan Order in 1867 and was ordained in 1874. He first worked at Novo Mesto as an organist and school music teacher, and from 1890 until his death he worked in Ljubljana where he trained a choir with a broad repertory of national and foreign works. Although he had made some earlier attempts at composition, Sattner was 50 years old when he began to study harmony and counterpoint with Matej Hubad. Following this he wrote the Missa seraphica, a Te Deum and the cantata Jeftejeva prisega ['Jephthah's Vow'], which were successful and also significant for the development of Slovenian church music. Sattner subsequently worked on even larger-scale compositions. In 1911 he completed the oratorio Assumptio Beatae Mariae Virginis, a composition of popular appeal and sincere expression, later reworking both the vocal and instrumental parts. He then wrote the symphonic cantatas Oljki ['To the Olive Tree'] (1914), Soči ['To the River Soča'] (1916), V pepelnični noči ['On the Night of Ash Wednesday'] (1921) and V kripti sv. Cecilije ['In St Cecilia's Crypt'] (1931). In 1922 he wrote an opera Tajda, of which the music was generally liked, despite the feeble libretto. He was respected as a melodist, and although harmonically he was initially rather conservative, he later came to terms with the more modern style.

EDO ŠKULJ

Sattor (Sattorov), Talabkhuja (Talb) (b Kishlak, Gul'zor Kulyab province, 12 Oct 1953). Tajik composer. As a child he played Tajik folk instruments, such as the ghidjak, rabob and tar, and after a year studying architecture he entered, at the age of 20, the vocal department of Dushanbe Music College, transferring to Damir Dustmukhamedov's composition class a year later (1974). He then studied composition with Balasanian and Chulaki at the Moscow Conservatory (1978–83) and it was from these teachers that Sattor acquired his artistic ideals and professionalism. He has taught at the Mirzo Tursun-zade Institute of Art in Tajikistan since 1989 and in 1995 was appointed prorector of the academic department of the institute. As a composer, he has worked in both theatrical and instrumental genres; his works demonstrate an inquiring mind and a keen sense of the artistic issues of the late 20th-century. Links with Tajik traditional music are often evident in works which explore eternal moral subjects.

LARISA ALEXANDROVNA NAZAROVA

Satz (Ger.). Originally, a musical setting or the act of polyphonic composition; under the influence of the grammar of spoken language, it has come to mean theme, period and especially movement (of a sonata, suite etc.), as well as style and texture.

The most general definition, 'musical setting', is based on the derivation of Satz from setzen, 'to set', which appeared in musical writings in the 16th and 17th centuries in the forms absetzen, 'to put into tablature', and aussetzen, 'to realize figures in a bass part'. Satz, or Tonsatz, first appeared in the 18th century, when it referred to a musical setting or the technique used therein. J.G. Walther (Musicalisches Lexikon, 1732) defined Thema as 'ein Satz zu einer Fuge, oder andern Ausarbeitung', thus making Satz equivalent to theme. H.C. Koch (Musikalisches Lexikon, 1802) gave four definitions, expanding its meaning while preserving the old notion of musical setting: (1) 'that single element of a piece of music which, in and of itself, expresses a complete thought' – Koch noted both the larger division of a section of a piece into Hauptsatz (or Thema) and Nebensätze (main theme and subsidiary themes) and the smaller division of a theme into Absatz and Schlusssatz (the modern notion of a period as the sum of two phrases, the first of which arrives at an imperfect cadence, the second of which completes the musical thought); (2) 'the connection of several individual elements in a main part of the whole', i.e. the modern concept of 'theme group'; (3) movement, i.e. an independent section of a cyclic composition; and (4) 'the grammatical construction of a piece of music', i.e. harmony and counterpoint.

Related to the last of these definitions is the idea of Satzlehre or Setzkunst. For Koch, Setzkunst and Komposition were synonyms. Later, Satzlehre is distinguished from Kompositionslehre in that it teaches one not to compose but merely to understand and be familiar with those occurrences which are typical features of polyphonic music.

By itself and in compounds Satz takes on several other musical meanings, such as contrapuntal pattern (e.g. Dezimensatz, 'parallel 10ths'), texture (e.g. Klaviersatz) and style (e.g. Kantilenensatz versus Chansonsatz); one also encounters the terms Fingersatz, 'fingering', and (Instrumenten-)satz, 'consort'.

Arnold Schoenberg was the first to define and explain the concept of Satz ('sentence') in positive terms as the antithesis of the period, and as one whose structure is essentially motivic in nature. He viewed sections of motivic comprehension and contrast, the former facilitating repetition, the latter serving the need for change, as the basic constituents of a logical concept of form that takes into account the psychological mechanisms governing the reception of music.

According to Schoenberg's model both the sentence and period begin with an exposition of a section of basic motifs in a two-bar phrase. Which of the two forms it develops into is determined by the course of the following phrase (bars 3–4). In the sentence it consists of an immediate repetition (e.g. literal repetition, sequence, inversion, etc.) or a slight variation of the first phrase, whereas in the period contrasting (i.e. more drastically altered) forms of the basic motifs occur at this point to ensure variety. In the period the consequent (bars 5–8 of the model) is therefore fundamentally a repetition of the antecedent with the motifs and harmonies correspondingly changed at the cadence, and often also in the bars leading up to it, to suit the function of the consequent as syntactic consolidation. Schoenberg considered the sentence 'a higher form of construction' than the period because he viewed its technique of 'liquidation' (reduction) of the characteristic features of the motifs in the following, more lengthy contrasting section (bars 5–8) as a type of development. For him cadences are generated motivically, and the harmonies and length of phrases are of only secondary importance in both the sentence and the period; the type of cadence and the proportions of the constituent sections are variable.

The first eight bars of the first movement of Beethoven's Piano Sonata in F minor, op.2 no.1, represent the prototype of a sentence; both phrases of a period can be constructed along the lines of a sentence, as shown in the opening eight bars of the first movement of Mozart's Piano Sonata in A major, K331.

WILLIAM DRABKIN/INGEBORG PFINGSTEN

Sätzl [Sätzel, Satzl], Christoph (b Brixen [now Bressanone], 1592–3; d Hall [now Solbad Hall], 13 April 1655). Austrian composer. He studied at the grammar school at Freiburg. By 1612 he was employed at the cathedral of Brixen, serving first as a teacher and from 1619 as Kapellmeister. He entered the priesthood in 1617. From 1 July 1632 until his death he served as chapel master at the Damenstift in Hall, whose chapel was modelled on that at the Innsbruck court: it had won a high reputation for the standard of its music, the constitution laying down that the Kapellmeister should be able both to compose and to instruct the choristers in the singing of contrapuntal music.

Sätzl cultivated most of the sacred styles and genres required of a 17th-century Catholic chapel master in the German-speaking lands. His published works include collections of masses, motets, Vespers psalms and settings of traditional German texts for Christmas and Easter. His writing ranges from works in the stile antico to up-to-date monodies and concertato compositions. Nearly all of his works are for small ensembles of one to five voices and basso continuo, often with obbligato instruments; the most ambitious scorings are two small-scale polychoral motets from the Oesterlicher Jubel (for two choirs of three voices each) and the Missa à 7 of 1661 (scored for four voices, including solo and ripieno parts, two violins or cornett, violone and continuo). His motet books of 1621 and 1628 are notable for the inclusion of obbligato instrumental parts; the vocal writing in these collections, however, remains unadventurous, making extensive use of syllabic text-setting and homophonic textures. The collections of the 1640s and 50s show a more individual approach, and provide strong evidence for the dissemination and influence of modern Italian music in the Tyrol. These collections include extended sections in triple meter, florid melismas, pairs of slurred quavers and semiquavers, and passages of light concertato imitation. The Certamen musicum of 1641 is devoted to vocal duets with obbligato parts for a pair of violins, a texture pioneered by Alessandro Grandi in his 'motetti con sinfonie'. Throughout his mature works, Sätzl shows a great sensitivity to the text, with imaginative word-setting and the judicious use of written-out passaggi.

Sätzl's masses include monodic settings, Ordinaries in the concertato style, and no fewer than six parody masses. Especially in the few-voice settings, he reveals a reliance on Italian models, with luxuriant melismas and long melismatic sequences. He introduced solo-ripieno distinctions in his final collection of masses (1661).

Sauce, Angel (b Caracas, 2 Aug 1911; d Caracas, 25 Dec 1995). Venezuelan composer, conductor and teacher. He studied violin, piano and composition at the José Angel Lamas Conservatory in Caracas, with Manuel Leoncio Rodríguez, Salvador Llamozas and Vicente Emilio Sojo respectively (graduated 1944). In 1945 he studied composition and conducting at Columbia University, New York. He founded several choral ensembles, including Coral Venezuela, and was associate conductor of the Venezuela SO for several years. He founded the Conservatorio Juan José Landaeta, which he directed until his death in 1995. Sauce's output includes symphonic, choral, chamber and incidental music for theatre. His best-known work is the cantata Jehová reina.

Saudek, Vojtěch (b Prague, 11 Feb 1951). French composer of Czech birth. He studied philology at Prague University and composition with Jiří Dvořáček at the Prague Academy of the Performing Arts (1977–83). At the Paris Conservatoire he studied composition and electroacoustic music with Guy Reibel and worked on a fellowship at IRCAM (1983–4). His linguistic background opened him to the world of English and German literature, from which he has drawn texts and themes for his music. His particular interest in Shakespeare may have come from his father, Erik Saudek, who translated Shakespeare's works into Czech. Since his emigration to France in 1983 he has collaborated regularly with the ensembles L'Itinéraire and 2e2m. Saudek combines the influences of French contemporary music with complex tonal, melodic and rhythmic layers. He uses electroacoustic music in combination with the symphony orchestra and solo instruments.

MIROSLAV PUDLÁK

Saudi Arabia, Kingdom of (Arabic Mamlaka al-Arabiya as-Saudiya). Country in the MIDDLE EAST, flanked by the Red sea and the ARABIAN GULF. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, with an area of 2·2 million km², covers nearly 80% of the Arabian peninsula. The population is small (21·66 million, 2000 estimate) but comparatively diverse; over one quarter is non-Saudi.

I. Introduction

1. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND. The area of the present kingdom has been exposed to many cultures, including Mesopotamian, Egyptian, Greek, Roman, Byzantine, Indian, Persian and Chinese, because of its important ancient trade routes, as well as the visits by millions of Muslim pilgrims to its Islamic holy cities, Mecca (Makkah) and Medina (Medinah). The Islamic era dates from the hijra (hegira), 622 CE, when the Prophet Muhammad returned to his birthplace of Medina. Ottoman Turks, who controlled the coastal regions of Saudi Arabia from the 16th century until the first quarter of the 20th, have also had significant influence on the area.

The Saudi state was cultivated in the 18th century on the basis of Wahhabism, a Muslim reform movement: in 1745 the Sa'ūd family joined with Muḥammad bin 'Abd al-Wahhāb, a jurist who preached a simple form of Islam that exposed abuses and called for a return to the literal interpretation of the Qur'an. Together with his followers, the family subsequently ruled inner Arabia with no recognition of any division between the secular and religious realms. This combined force succeeded in establishing the present kingdom in 1932, after Shaykh 'Abd al-'Azīz bin al-Sa'ūd had defeated the Ottoman Turks who occupied the coastal regions. Wahhabism was crucial for the nation's success; it served as an ideological justification for the struggle against the Turks, who practised what was believed to be a corrupt form of Islam. Shortly thereafter (with the discovery of oil in 1938), the nation quickly gained recognition as a wealthy oil-producing country.

2. GEOGRAPHICAL REGIONS. There are five primary regions in Saudi Arabia (see illustration). Al-Hijaz, along the upper Red sea coast, is of great historical importance to Arab civilization. It was unrivalled as an international meeting-place; the holy cities of Mecca and Medina are located there, as was the pre- and early-Islamic annual fair (sūq 'ukadh) featuring a great poetry contest with sung poems. Najd, the harsh heartland, has the capital city, Riyadh, and is the home of Wahhabism and the ruling Sa'ūd family. 'Asir, along the southern border, has close cultural ties with neighbouring Yemen. Al-Hasa, the Eastern province, has the oil industry and cultural links with the Arabian Gulf. Al-Rub' al-Khali (the Empty Quarter), a very large inhospitable desert, is inhabited by a small number of Bedouin nomads (mainly on its periphery).

3. SOCIO-CULTURAL CONTEXTS. Saudi folk music dates back thousands of years, originating in Bedouin culture. Each region, city and village has a unique tradition. Since the country's inception, many musicians have been influenced by the thriving music industry of Egypt and other Arab countries, but Saudi musicians never ceased to perform and promote the music of their own heritage.

Nevertheless, with its close ideological links to Wahhabism, Saudi nationalism was accompanied by religious puritanism. The Wahhabi concern for strict interpretation of the Qur'an, combined with a distaste for the Ottoman lifestyle and for Sufism (which had flourished under the Ottomans), compelled the sect to impose certain prohibitions pertaining to daily life. These included a ban on ecstatic group worship, dancing, musical instruments, and singing. See also ISLAMIC RELIGIOUS MUSIC, §I, 2.

Throughout the history of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, restrictions on music have been enforced to various degrees. Severe beatings have been given to all who attended musical gatherings. Instruments have been confiscated and destroyed, homes entered, and gramophones and record players demolished. Warnings have been issued against involvement in anything that concerns music. Yet, even during the most restrictive periods, musicians would gather clandestinely outside the cities to perform. Today, there is still considerable control over music. Lay people and musicians alike are most cautious with musical activities, especially women, as they are under greater scrutiny than men.

Some musical performance occurs during work-related tasks; other performance, like that of sung poetry, is often shared in a private setting. However, most music is part of an event or ritual. Today, as in the past, music is used to celebrate weddings, engagements, religious holidays, visits of dignitaries and births. In former times, it was used in rituals of circumcision, healing, harvesting, sowing and the hunt. The greatest amount of music-making takes place during social gatherings on summer evenings. Performances frequently continue until dawn; they are preferably held outdoors, but increasingly occur in partially enclosed areas or large theatres and halls.

II. Main musical traditions

Vocal compositions predominate, in accordance with the long-standing Bedouin reverence for language. Solo vocal performance might include sung poetic forms, like the ḥudā' (camel song) of pre-Islamic times, often accompanied by the rabāba (fiddle). Collective performance features antiphonal singing or responsorial singing between a soloist and group. Dance is a regular occurrence of collective folk performance, and even if the chorus is kneeling, a great deal of body movement is present. Participants sit in either a circle (or semicircle) or, more commonly, in two facing ranks.

1. General musical characteristics. Saudi music, and that of its peninsular neighbours, is distinguished from other Middle Eastern music by a rich choral tradition and extensive use of polyrhythm. These reveal the significant influence of African pilgrims, slaves and hired workers who have lived in Arabia for centuries. To this day their descendants play a notable role in music-making.

A typical Saudi polyrhythmic pattern might include the rhythmic cycle (īqā'), sometimes called al-sa'ūdī, of 3 + 3 + 2 (dum, dum, tek), layered simultaneously with a syncopated eight-beat pattern in double time. Group singing is performed in unison or heterophonically. There is generally no polyphony (though some pearl-diver songs (fijīrī) have features that resemble polyphony).

The form of compositions depends largely on text. Because music is transmitted orally, songs tend to consist of short, memorable, rhythmic phrases with much repetition. A brief, free section usually opens a piece, establishing the tonal centre, melodic mode (maqām), text or (for dance pieces) rhythmic beat.

2. Collective performance traditions.

(i) 'Arḍa. The 'arḍa, a weapon dance popular in al-Najd and al-'Asir, is the primary national folksong and dance, derived from an ancient tradition of war chants sung by advancing warriors to frighten the enemy. It originally showed the numerical strength of the group, its arsenal of weapons and the skills of the fighters. The lengthy performance prepared the community for combat and raised morale. In earlier times, the 'arḍa was performed by both men and women together. It is now danced by men at social occasions.

Carrying swords or daggers and standing shoulder to shoulder in two facing lines, the participants step from side to side, slowly moving their swords up and down. From the midst of the group, a poet-singer (shā'ir) presents verses in short melodic phrases, which are then repeated by a group of dancers.

Slightly different versions are performed in Najd and 'Asir; the Najd rendition, often danced in public by the king himself, is more famous and has been adopted throughout the Gulf region. The Najd 'arḍa is in a compound duple metre, with a deliberate six-beat pattern (dum, dum, tek, dum, tek, tek) performed on the ṭabl (dum) and double-headed ṭār (tek) frame drums. There are normally one or two ṭabl players and five or six ṭār drummers. The 'Asir 'arḍa has a quick, duple, galloping beat. (See also Bedouin music, §2(vi).)

(ii) Majrūr. The majrūr is a folk art associated primarily with Ṭa'if, but also found in 'Asir. Rich in polyrhythm, it may have originated in northern Arabia or may have been brought to the peninsula by Africans. The text is usually a love poem or heroic eulogy.

Each participant in the two facing ranks of performers holds a treble ṭār (pl. ṭīran). The lead drummer sits between the ranks with a bass-sounding tabīr across his lap and treble ṭār in his hand. He sets the tempo for the singing dancers, who move to the centre singly or in small groups. One who has left his rank can beat out a new rhythm, which the others must follow (this practice is called al-khisra). Rhythms include those referred to as majrash and shabshār.

(iii) Mizmār. The mizmār, believed to be over a thousand years old, is the most popular dance of the western region. Regularly performed in Mecca, Medina and Jiddah, it is exclusively for men. A pair of performers holds long wooden canes, feigning combat. The dance's name derives from the aerophone mizmār, which is traditionally featured but not essential. Rhythmic clapping (tasfīq) is employed, often in hocket style. Melodies known as zawamīl are chanted to the accompaniment of various sized ṭīran (usually six).

(iv) Fijīrī. Pearl-diver music traditions, known as fijīrī, thrived in the Eastern province until the 1930s. Every dhow (boat) would leave port with several musicians (niham) on board whose sole purpose was to encourage and entertain the divers. Divers and their assistants would often join in the singing. Some pieces featured a solo improvisor accompanied by the chorus producing an extraordinarily deep vocal drone or ostinato, testament to the great breath control of the divers. Hand-clapping and drums (ṭār and ṭabl) accompanied the niham, sometimes with cymbals (sījān). When divers returned after a long, arduous summer excursion, they would spend winter nights at a gathering place, al-dār, where they would sing and dance a variety of styles, including a'shūrī, khamārī, sāmrī, and 'arḍa. (See also Arabian Gulf.)

(v) Sāmrī. Sāmrī is a cycle of songs sung at night with the text of short poems about love or physical beauty. Although the poetry comes from the ancient nabaṭī tradition, the focus is more on music than text. Sāmrī has many melodies, but only one rhythm, with a triple core (dum, tek, tek).

In rural areas, one of the functions of sāmrī was to keep a snake-bitten person awake until a healer could arrive.

During Wahhabi music prohibition, musicians would have someone feign a snake bite so they could perform unhindered.

(vi) Galtih. Poetic duelling (galtih or riddiyyih) is part of the nabaṭī tradition with origins in Najd. It is an improvised form in which two rival poet-singers take turns in delivering originally created verses. Following each soloist, an ensemble repeats the text. Hand-clapping (tasfīq) is usually the only non-vocal sound.

(vii) Other forms. The sahbā was a favourite collective performance of al-Hijaz fishermen celebrating their return home from a lengthy sea voyage. This ancient form is in two types, Egyptian or Yemeni, and is now regularly presented at festive occasions. In Yanbu', the 'ijil, simsimiyya and mārwās are forms with an old Egyptian flavour; they relieved monotony and provided motivation while sailors performed chores. One of the oldest forms in the peninsula, al-khobaytī, is known for the complex movements of individual singing dancers. Al-sihba, from outside Medina, recalls the famous muwashshaḥ poems and songs of Arab Andalusia. Al-khasra, with western Somalian characteristics, is usually sung to the accompaniment of the simsimiyya. In the Eastern province, there is ghajarī (Gypsy) music and the African based līwa. Najd has al-najdiyya, whose text revolves around themes of love, brotherhood and courage. In the north, the dahha, which might employ a rabāba, is popular.

III. Musical instruments

The core instrument of traditional Saudi music is the frame drum ṭār or duff. This is made of goat or sheepskin and, as a rule, comes in sets of six, ranging in size from 31 to 62 cm in diameter. In the opinion of the religious community, these hand-played, single headed drums are the most acceptable instruments: they disdain all melodic instruments.

Variations of the frame drum are found in the weapon dance, 'arḍa. Najd 'arḍa features a double-headed frame drum ornamented with brightly coloured wool tassels (danādīsh). It has a wooden handle so that the performer can hold it high above the head while playing with a stick. The ṭār used in 'Asir 'arḍa is probably of African origin and has been referred to as zalafa or sahfa. This drum has a membrane on one side and is partially closed on the other, leaving open a mid-sized hole. Projecting wooden pegs placed in the outer rim help secure the head, giving a spoked appearance. The hand-played drum is held with the opening against the body (often with the aid of a strap), allowing the performer to alter the sound by muting the hole against his or her chest.

These frame drums are often accompanied by two ṭubūl (sing. ṭabl), cylindrical laced membranophones of various sizes that play a bass drum role. Other drums include the goblet-shaped tabīr found in majrūr performance; a variety of conical, double-headed drums; kettledrums, usually clay, with various names (e.g. Zir arḍhī); and the small, cylindrical, double-headed mirwās. Many of these drums are probably of African or Indian origin.

Sometimes, small cymbals (sījān) are added to collective performances, especially in the music of al-Hasa sailors. Other idiophones include found objects such as metal motor car wheel drums struck with sticks. The tanaka ('tank') is made of a petrol can or large date tin, often filled with pebbles and played by hand or with beaters.

The rabāba, is the primary melodic instrument of the Bedouin, a bowed chordophone with an oblong soundbox. Each broad side is covered with goat- or camelskin, although, by tradition, wolfskin is preferred. The rattan, horse-hair bow is held with an underhanded grip. The rabāba is used to accompany sung poetry, such as that of a short nabaṭī (vernacular) poem or a section of a longer one. A measured, narrow-ranged phrase will be sung and played heterophonically, then repeated alone on the rabāba, usually with some modest ornamentation. Instrumental interludes provide time for the poet to create or recall verses.

The simsimiyya (sometimes called ṭanbūra) is a five-stringed lyre common to Sudan, Ethiopia and Egypt. Popular in al-Hijaz and 'Asir and also found in the eastern region, it is most associated with the port city of Yanbu' (north of Jiddah) and with sailors and fishermen. The simsimiyya most prevalent in Saudi Arabia is approximately 70 cm in length and has a round, single-holed wooden soundbox, or a soundbox of a rectangular petrol can. The strings are adjusted by tuning pegs at the top of the triangular instrument. It is played by strumming open strings with a plectrum in the right hand while dampening others with the left hand. Typically, it produces a drone during the opening improvised vocal section of a piece; then percussion enters and the simsimiyya provides a lively ostinato pattern.

The 'ūd is quite popular in Saudi Arabia. It has long been the main urban melodic instrument and was perhaps considered too fragile for transportation in the desert. Large Egyptian-style instruments are imported from Cairo.

The mizmār is a small wind instrument comprised of two single-reed bamboo pipes tied together and played simultaneously. The pipe lengths vary slightly, thus producing harmonic beats when played. The mizmār features in the dance that bears its name.

Other instruments include the oboe-like instrument ṣūrnāy (also sometimes confusingly called mizmār), found in al-Hasa and used in dances such as the African-style līwa. Less traditional, yet common instruments are the violin, qānūn (plucked zither), Western drum set, electronic microtonal keyboard and instruments of wind and percussion marching bands.

IV. Modern developments

The first music to be sanctioned by the Saudi government was that of the military marching wind and percussion band. Given its immediate and significant function, it was least offensive to Wahhabism. Moreover, Arabia had a history of using music to rally fighters, and Turkish military brass bands had been familiar for many years.

The young soldier Tāriq 'Abd al-Ḥakīm (b 1922) established the first Saudi military bands, having studied music in Cairo. He went on to produce and compose pieces featuring old styles, becoming an eminent musician and scholar, the most significant exponent of national Saudi music. Another musician, Sirāj 'Umar, is well known for his nationalistic songs, including Al-watan ('Nation'), which was heard in morning school assemblies. MUḤAMMED 'ABDU represents Saudi music internationally and at home. He and Ṭalāl Madāh (b 1941), whose careers mirror each other, are revered singers and composers of modern works. They perform in a variety of styles and dialects, incorporating regional rhythms and instruments. (For women musicians, see §V below.)

Since the 1980s, partially due to a wariness of foreign cultural influence, the government has been actively supporting folk arts and music. A state-run annual cultural festival established in 1985, known as al-Janadriyya, features folk artists and popular singers, such as the favoured Muḥammed 'Abdu.

V. Women and music

Saudi Arabia has a long and substantial tradition of women's music. In pre-Islamic and early Islamic times, women and girls dominated the music arena. The famed professional women musicians known as QAYNAS were virtuoso performers from al-Hijaz. Accounts note that when the Prophet Muhammad migrated to Medina in 622, he was welcomed by young women of the Banī Najār tribe, playing frame drums and singing the now famed Ṭala'a al-badru 'alaynā. By the first century of Islam, women were largely responsible for establishing al-Hijaz as an important centre for both male and female singers. Beyond urban music, women took part in chanting songs to encourage warriors into battle. They would dance and sing the 'arḍa, partake in poetic duelling and perform at tribal feasts.

Today, in gender-segregated Saudi Arabia, the authorities impose more restrictions on women than men, especially with regard to music. Female musical talent is commonly hidden or at least not flaunted. With one or two exceptions, Saudi women have never been permitted to produce professional recordings in the country. However, women are highly active in live musical performance, more so than men. Women's wedding parties, ḥaflāt al-zaffa, featuring women musicians, are held nightly during the summer in urban centres, whereas male marriage celebrations usually have no music.

At women's parties, the instruments and type of ensemble vary, depending on the social and financial status of a family and their religious beliefs. The core ensemble of wedding parties (and the most acceptable for families concerned with religious doctrine) consists of a singer (muṭriba) who sometimes plays the 'ūd, and her vocal-percussion group of six to eight ṭār players, who are often related to one another. Ensembles hired by wealthy, westernized families might add a drum set, microtonal keyboard and violin(s). Such groups often perform popular Gulf-region songs. Today, at small house wedding feasts, a soloist is sometimes employed; she sings, plays the ṭār and accompanies herself on a keyboard. Increasingly, female disc jockeys are hired to play recordings throughout the night. In any event, those who provide music are handsomely paid. The audience participates by dancing and producing the high-pitched women's trill, zaghārīd or ghatārīf. The most prestigious wedding performer of al-Hijaz is the aged singer and 'ūd-player Tuha. It is an honour to have her perform at a wedding, especially if she had played at the wedding of the bride's mother or grandmother.

Leading women singer-musicians with national reputations include Ibtisām Luṭfī, known as 'the Umm Kulthum of Saudi Arabia'. This gifted blind singer went into semi-retirement in the 1980s, but her recordings survive at the government-controlled Saudi Media Channels. Ibtisām came from the musical house of Ṭalāl Madāh (see §IV above). He also championed the famous female singer 'Itāb, with whom he made a few duet recordings. 'Itāb has an international reputation in the Middle East and has lived and recorded abroad.

LISA A. URKEVICH

Sauer. Austrian firm of music publishers. Its founder Ignaz Sauer (b Bohemia, 1 April 1759; d Vienna, 2 Dec 1833) began his activities in the art and music business as a partner in Joseph Eder's firm (founded 1794); Sauer terminated this relationship at the end of 1797. On 17 January 1798 he advertised his own 'Kunstverlag zu den sieben Schwestern'; this name refers to his seven daughters by his first marriage and appears in the plate inscriptions of his publications, which always bore an 'S.S.' in front of the number. His publications were initially commissioned to Leopold Kozeluch and Johann Traeg. In March 1801 he became the Viennese agent for the firm of André in Offenbach. In a large advertisement in the Wiener Zeitung of 25 July 1801 (two years before Alois Senefelder's firm was founded) he announced the first attempt at stoneplate printing in Austria with an edition of 12 Ländler by F.M. Pecháček. The confusion of war in 1805 and 1809 caused a financial decline, and on 25 November 1813 Sauer was obliged to give his stock-in-trade on commission to H.F. Müller.

On 9 December 1822 Sauer was joined by Marcus (Maximilian Josef) Leidesdorf (1787–1840), the son of a Jewish merchant, and as Sauer & Leidesdorf the firm revived, producing about 750 numbers in the next five years. Sauer relinquished his art dealer's licence on 30 April 1826, possibly because of his advanced age. On 9 May 1826 the firm was renamed M.J. Leidesdorf and continued to prosper until 18 July 1832, when Leidesdorf left for Italy and the licence was kept in abeyance until 15 May 1834, when Anton Berka took over the firm. On 4 September 1835 it passed to Diabelli & Co.

Ignaz Sauer's firm, while interesting for the history of publishing, was musically less significant; apart from issuing single works by Bonifazio Asioli, Clementi, Eybler, Mederitsch and Pasterwiz, it published many of Vanhal's late works (see illustration) and some of Sauer's own compositions. But as Sauer & Leidesdorf its calibre improved greatly; Leidesdorf's compositions were superficial fashionable pieces, but under his guidance the company published music by Beethoven and Weber, 49 works by Schubert (many of them first editions, including Die schöne Müllerin) and piano reductions of many of Rossini's operas with notable title decorations by Moritz von Schwind.

ALEXANDER WEINMANN

Sauer, Emil (George Conrad) von (b Hamburg, 8 Oct 1862; d Vienna, 27 April 1942). German pianist, teacher and composer. Having had lessons with his mother, who was Scottish, and also with Ludwig Deppe, he went to the Moscow Conservatory and became a pupil of Nikolay Rubinstein. After the latter's death in 1881 Sauer attempted to establish a career, but meeting with limited success, continued his studies. During the summers of 1884–5 he worked with Liszt at Weimar and then made a noteworthy Berlin début with Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto and Henselt's F minor Concerto, after which he built a reputation as one of the leading virtuosos. From 1901 Sauer taught at the Meisterschule für Klavierspiel of the Vienna Conservatory, and remained there until 1907, when he moved to Dresden. In 1915 he resumed the post in Vienna, as head of the Meisterschule, staying for a further six years. He taught there again for a decade from 1931. He was active as both teacher and performer up to the time of his death. Sauer's second wife was his student, the Mexican pianist Angelica Morales (1911–96), a noted Bach player. Among the better-known of his other pupils were Stefan Askenase, Elly Ney, Monique de la Bruchollerie, Helena Morsztyn and Edward Goll. Sauer was ennobled by the Austrian Emperor in 1917, when he adopted the prefix 'von'.

Although frequently associated with lighter virtuoso music, Sauer was acknowledged by his colleagues as a near-perfect interpreter of the masterworks of the repertory, matching an exceptionally developed technique with both temperament and poetic inspiration. His own compositions, which include two piano concertos, two sonatas and several other bravura works for piano, make brilliant use of the instrument, although their place in the repertory was short-lived. Sauer made a number of recordings, including both the Liszt piano concertos, and was also engaged by Peters to edit a sizeable bulk of the romantic piano literature, a task he accomplished with expertise and imagination. He published an early autobiography, Meine Welt (Stuttgart, 1901).

JAMES METHUEN-CAMPBELL

Sauer, Wilhelm (b Schönbeck, Mecklenburg-Vorpommern, 23 March 1831; d Frankfurt an der Oder, 9 April 1916). German organ builder. He attended the Gymnasium in Friedland, and learned the organ builder's craft from his father Carl Ernst Sauer (1797–1873), from E.F. Walcker in Ludwigsburg, and from Cavaillé-Coll in Paris. Another study tour took him to England. In 1857 he founded his own organ building firm in Frankfurt an der Oder, and set up a branch in Königsberg in 1860. His first large organ was for Königsberg cathedral. By the time of his death the firm had built over 1100 organs, including the large instruments for the Rudolfinum in Prague (1884), St Petri in Leipzig (1885), Bremen cathedral (1894), Berlin cathedral (1904), the Kaiser-Wilhelm-Gedächtniskirche in Berlin (1895) and the Thomaskirche, Leipzig (1888; made famous by Karl Straube and Max Reger). Sauer was also very successful abroad, and exported organs to Argentina, Brazil, Ecuador, Finland, Russia, Peru and South Africa. His instruments are symphonic in character, made of the best materials and notable for many technical innovations. The sound of Sauer organs is chiefly determined by the principals, while the mixtures are very sparingly used. Sauer combined orchestral tonal colour with solo-like flute and string sounds. The Flûte harmonique, Flûte octaviante and Voix céleste stops in particular display a French feeling for sound, as do Sauer's fine reed stops. However, he also continued to use some conservative stops such as the Quintatön and Rohrflöte. His large organs as a rule have four manuals, over 100 stops, and sometimes an echo manual. He was one of the first organ builders to introduce the cone valve into Germany, while he was very slow to decide on building organ actions with pneumatic pipework and the consequent free combination of stops. He patented his invention of the 'combination pedal' on 3 August 1881.

Sauer was in frequent contact with leading composers and musicians of his time, including Liszt, Richard Strauss, Reger, Nikisch and Weingartner. He was appointed organ builder to the royal court of Prussia on 8 May 1884. After his death, his workshop passed into the hands of the Walcker organ building family. The firm founded by Sauer still exists today under his name in Müllrose near Frankfurt an der Oder.

FELIX FRIEDRICH

Sauguet [Poupard], Henri(-Pierre) (b Bordeaux, 18 May 1901; d Paris, 21 June 1989). French composer. He studied the piano from an early age, and in 1916 became organist and choirmaster at Floirac near Bordeaux, taking organ lessons with Paul Combes. He was unable to find a composition teacher until 1919 when he went to study with Canteloube in Montaubon. There a local teacher, Léon Moulin, introduced him to composers such as Satie, Koechlin and Milhaud; he also got to know the work of Cocteau and Maxime Jacob through the young poet and composer Louis Émié.

In 1920, in imitation of the Groupe des Six, Poupard, as he was then known, formed the Groupe des Trois with Émié and the composer Jean-Marcel Lizotte. For their first concert on 12 December, he assumed his mother's maiden name, Sauguet, so as not to embarrass his father by any association with modern music. Sauguet's by now regular correspondence with Milhaud resulted in an invitation to Paris in January 1922, where he met Les Six, Jean Wiéner and Cocteau. More significant still were his encounters with Satie (around whom he formed the École d'Arcueil with Henri Cliquet-Pleyel, Roger Désormière and Maxime Jacob) and Koechlin, from whom, on Milhaud's recommendation, he took composition lessons until at least 1927.

Sauguet's first significant works date from this period, notably the Trois françaises, first performed in 1923, and Le plumet du colonel (1924), an opéra-bouffe for which Sauguet wrote the plot and libretto. First performed in a double bill with Stravinsky's L'histoire du soldat, it revealed a vocation for the stage that was to be amply justified by the eight operas and 26 ballets of the composer's later career. In it the influence of Satie and Les Six is complemented by that of Richard Strauss: Sauguet refers in La musique, ma vie to Strauss's 'mouvement lyrique et théâtral (qui m'a servi de modèle)' (p.238). In 1927 came his first major success with the ballet La chatte, commissioned by Diaghilev for the Ballets Russes. Moreover his first film score in 1933 (for L'Herbier's L'épervier) resulted in many more, especially during the 1940s and 50s, during which time he also composed incidental music as well as radio (and later television) scores.

From 1926 to 1936 (with interruptions for, among other works, a second opéra-bouffe, La contrebasse, and a fine ballet La nuit), he worked on a large-scale opera, La chartreuse de Parme, which had a successful run of nine performances at the Paris Opéra in 1939. Sauguet's longest work, and one of his finest, it is in many ways a traditional opera in a full-blooded italianate mould. But whereas earlier works had been characterised by clear textures, limpid harmonies and relatively straightforward melodies, his music now takes on a more complex harmonic language, which suggests the influence of contemporary Russian symphonists, notably Prokofiev and Shostakovich.

Except for a brief period of military service, Sauguet spent the war composing, helping his many Jewish friends as best he could and finding refuge in the 18th-century elegance of his opera La gageure imprévue (given at the Opéra-Comique in 1944) and his ballet Les mirages, a moving portrayal of solitude. He dedicated his powerful first symphony, the Symphonie expiatoire (1945), to 'the innocent victims of the war'. The ballet Les forains, also from 1945, became Sauguet's most popular work. The death of his mother in 1947 resulted in one of Sauguet's finest works, the luminous Second String Quartet, while the Visions infernales of the following year is perhaps Sauguet's most successful setting of poems by his close friend Maxime Jacob, and a reminder of the composer's considerable vocal output.

The later decades were marked by several large-scale works, including the delightful opera Les caprices de Marianne (1954), the extraordinarily intense L'oiseau a vu tout cela (1960), the Symphony no.4 'Du troisième âge' (1971), and three further operas. He also composed several musique concrète works. His last composition dates from 1987, a song entitled Dans la maison de paix with a text by Raphaël Cluzel (1932–1996), whom Sauguet adopted as his son a few years before his death.

Alongside his prolific composition, Sauguet was active as a critic in the earlier part of his career, writing for L'Europe nouvelle (from 1929), Le jour (until 1939) and La bataille (1945– *c*1948). In 1976 he was elected to the Académie des Beaux-Arts in succession to Milhaud. He served as President of, among other organizations, the Académie du Disque Français, the Union des Compositeurs (which he founded) and of the Association Una Voce for the preservation of Latin and Gregorian chant in the Roman Catholic rite. A sensitive, humane man with a great sense of fun, he composed with spontaneity and lightness of touch, though his finest works possess a sense of tragic grandeur and profound compassion for the human condition.

JEREMY DRAKE

Saumell Robredo, Manuel (b Havana, 1817; d Havana, 14 Aug 1870). Cuban composer. He came from a poor family, and received his musical education in Havana. He was the first Cuban composer to cultivate musical nationalism. Reflecting the early 19th-century Romantic style, his music is characterized by Cuban rhythmic patterns derived from Spanish folk material but developed with local characteristics. Several established Cuban dance patterns are first found in his piano contradanzas: the habanera in La amistad, the danzón in La tedezco, the guajira in La Matilde, the clave in La Celestina, the criolla in La nené, and the Cuban song in Recuerdos tristes. The cinquillo rhythm, which appeared in Cuban popular music from Oriente province around 1802, was first used in concert music by Saumell (El somatén). In 1839 Saumell conceived a Romantic national opera based on J.A. Echevarría's novel Antonelli, set in Havana in 1590. Indians and black slaves were to sing and take part in the action, but the music was never written.

Saunders, Rebecca (b London, 19 Dec 1967). British composer. After early training as a violinist and a degree course at Edinburgh University, she studied composition with Rihm in Karlsruhe, Germany (1991–4) and thereafter with Osborne (1994–7). Prizes from the Academy of Art in Berlin (1995) and the Ernst von Siemens Foundation (1996) enabled her to work in both New York and Brussels, but she has remained resident principally in Berlin. Since October 1997 her works have been published by Edition Peters, London.

Saunders's music has been widely performed and broadcast in Germany but is less well known in the country of her birth. It stands somewhat apart from mainstream developments in British composition, being acutely concerned with the qualities of instrumental sound, typically explored through an array of extended performing techniques. Much of her music comprises concise gestures separated by periods of silence, or sustained explorations of narrow pitch bands. Several pieces also contain important parts for mechanical music boxes. Tense juxtaposition of familiar musical materials and extreme abstraction is a characteristic feature of all the mature works. Saunders has based three pieces (one now withdrawn) on Molly Bloom's monologue from James Joyce's Ulysses.

Saùng-gauk. Horizontal arched harp of Myanmar (formerly Burma). This article deals with the history, construction, performance technique and tunings of the instrument; for discussion of context, performing practice, repertory and performers see MYANMAR, §II, 3. Two types of arched harp exist in the country: one, made by Karen and Mon hill peoples in lower Myanmar, has five to seven strings tuned by pegs (see T. and T.A. Stern, 1971); the other, long associated with Buddhist royal dynasties, is the highly decorated saùng-gauk tuned by cords encircling the arm or arch (fig.1). It has been claimed that the saùng-gauk is related to Sumerian horizontal arched harps (*c*2500 BCE), the connecting link being the corded harps of Buddhist dynasties in ancient India, though this theory lacks linguistic support, as the Sanskrit name vīṇā does not occur in the languages of Myanmar. The earliest harp representation in Myanmar appears on a mid-7th-century Buddhist relief at Śrī Kṣetra (see Becker, 1967, p.21). The orchestra, possibly Mon, that accompanied a Pyu embassy from upper Myanmar to China in 801–2 included arched harps with pegs (see Twitchett and Christie, 1959). Burmese chronicles describe harps in ceremonial ensembles at medieval Pagan as well as women harpists in attendance on royalty, also shown in surviving temple reliefs and mural paintings. Outstanding among these are two reliefs in Nagayon temple (*c*1090), which prove that harpists depicted to the left of centre are in a normal right-handed playing position; those on the right are in mirror image (not left-handed). A characteristically curved string holder links one Nagayon harp to the modern harp (Williamson, 1981, p.219), and cords around the arch appear in a mural painting of the Làw-ká-hteik-pan temple (*c*1125), together with the earliest gloss using the old Burmese name coṅ.

A stylized harp with incurved arch and 11 strings appears in a fresco of a later dynasty at Ava (1364–1555) in upper Myanmar, while a folding manuscript of the Kòn-baung dynasty (1752–1885) shows a harp with slender incurved arch, tasselled cords and boat-shaped resonator, with a small loop extension at the prow. Specifications for later harp makers were probably set by Myá-wadi Wun-gyì Ù Sá (1766–1853), who standardized the number of strings at 13 and reinforced the instrument's construction, using the great tensile strength of a curved root of a shà tree (stem-woods were formerly used) to create a slender, graceful arch. Dei-wá-ein-da Ù Maung Maung Gyì (1855–1933), the last court harpist, added the 14th string; two more were added by Alin-ga-kyaw-zwa Ù Bá Thàn (*c*1960), resulting in the contemporary 16-string saùng-gauk.

Under royal patronage and through several decades of British rule, master harpists made harps for themselves and, by commission, for others. After a period of decline before World War II, during which no harps were made, the State Schools of Fine Arts were founded in Rangoon (now Yangon) and Mandalay following the independence of Myanmar in 1948. Ù Hmat Kyì (b 1917), a descendant of the kings' woodcarvers and stonecutters in the old royal city, constructed seven harps for the new school, having made his first in 1947 after an antique harp (by 1959 he had made 150 harps and was producing 30 a year); his harps were decorated by Ù Htùn Myaing, descended from the kings' lacquer artists.

In performance (fig.2), the harp is placed horizontally across the lap, the arch forward and to the harpist's left. The harpist braces the fingers of the left hand against the arch, prepared to shift them agilely up and down; the tip of the left thumb, with squared nail, is placed against the string from the inside to raise the pitch and to perform frequent embellishments. The forefinger and thumb of the right hand activate the strings at their centre, separately or in pairs. In Mandalay the principal techniques are: (a) let-kat ('hand sticking close'), in which the palm is close to the plane of the string, with fingers extended – the straight forefinger (bent slightly backwards at the terminal joint) strokes the string vertically upwards towards the next string, producing a full round tone with the fundamental prevailing; (b) kaw ('to prise out of place'), in which the hooked forefinger plucks outwards and upwards to produce a thin sharp tone, with the second harmonic prevailing (see Adkins and others, 1983) – kaw is used in the upper voice, often in sequence with let-kat, to resolve dissonances; (c) zon-hswè-gyìn ('paired plucking'), in which the hooked forefinger and thumb pluck simultaneously, with finger, wrist or free arm movement; (d) tat, a pitchless 'plunk' produced by damping the string with the side of the palm before activating it; (e) the left thumb plucks the bass of the harp figuration from the inside (occasionally to double octaves), while the right hand provides a melodic pattern with thumb and forefinger. Throughout performance skilled damping promotes clarity: by damping the string just sounded with the middle finger as the forefinger sounds the next string; by inner or side palms of the hand; by direct touch immediately following activation (staccato).

Of the four tunings extant in 1885, hnyìn-lòn, possibly named after an obsolete mouth organ, is the original tuning (here based on the principal note C; see ex.1*a*). Auk-pyan, meaning 'reverse position', based on F, is essentially a transposition of hnyìn-lòn tuning (ex.1*b*). These tunings divide between them nine classes of song and cover much of the literature. Palè (based on B♭; ex.1*c*) was devised for new tunes and modes inspired by the Siamese court resident at Ava after 1767. Myin-zaìng (based on E♭; ex.1*d*) is closely related to palè.

Hnyìn-lòn is basic to the other tunings as, together with the stopped notes (the black notes in the examples), it provides the original Burmese heptatonic scale, approximately C major with E and B lowered by 50 cents. Its note names (here abbreviated) and descending modal numbers remain fixed in the other tunings; tya, tei and tyàw are movable. The last court harpist devised a compound tuning for his 14-string harp, so that he could perform all classes of song without retuning (ex.2*a*). It is called hsé-leì-gyò hnyí-nì ('14-string tuning') and is still in use. Ù Bá Thàn based his 16-string compound tuning (*c*1960) on the above, calling it apò-hnyí-nì (ex.2*b*). The intervals of the compound tunings now closely match those of the Western tempered scale, and younger singers can no longer hear or sing the subtle intervals of the older tunings. In Mandalay, however, an effort is being made to preserve hnyìn-lòn tuning for the oldest classes of song.

MURIEL C. WILLIAMSON

Saupe, Christian Gottlob (b Wechselburg, 1 June 1763; d Glauchau, 8 Jan 1819). German organist and composer. He was a friend of Daniel Gottlob Türk and was probably his pupil. In 1782 he moved from Dresden to Glauchau, where the counts of Schönburg appointed him court and municipal organist (unlike his predecessors, however, he had no political function within the community); he held this office until his death.

Saupe performed on Glauchau's Silbermann organ and was reputedly an excellent virtuoso. He composed two large-scale sacred works, some liturgical pieces, songs and keyboard sonatas in a highly personal style with considerable melodic invention and feeling for form. He carefully selected and admirably interpreted the texts to his lieder, which in some respects foreshadow Schubert; his historical romance Das Razberger Mädchen influenced Loewe's ballad style. His piano works are in the idiom of Mozart and Clementi, but contain bold harmonic progressions and other effects of an individual character which point towards Beethoven.

WALTER HÜTTEL

Sauret, Emile (b Dun-le-Roi, Cher, 2 May 1852; d London, 12 Feb 1920). French violinist and composer. Little is known about his training as a violinist. It is not certain that he studied at the Paris Conservatoire, although some of his biographers state that he did, nor is it even certain that he attended the Brussels Conservatory, although he is considered to have been one of Charles-Auguste de Beriot's best pupils. If we believe the dedication of the fourth part of his manual Gradus ad Parnassum du violiniste (Leipzig, 1896) he also studied with Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski. A child prodigy, he had already performed in public before he was eight in Vienna, then in London and Paris, where he was invited to play on several occasions at the court of Napoleon III. He joined the army on the outbreak of war in 1870, but resumed his career as an international virtuoso two years later, beginning with a tour of the USA.This was so successful that he was invited back several times between 1874 and 1906. In 1876 he met Hans von Bülow and Anton Rubinstein in New York. On returning to Europe, he performed for the first time at the Leipzig Gewandhaus in May 1876, playing Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. During the periods between his tours of the major European cities he taught at the Neue Akademie der Tonkunst in Berlin. He married the Venezuelan pianist Teresa Carreño in 1873; they were soon divorced, and he married again in 1879. He then gave many concerts in Sweden and elsewhere in Scandinavia and in 1892 was admitted to the Swedish Royal Academy of Music in Stockholm. He settled in London in 1890 and succeeded Prosper Sainton as professor at the Royal Academy of Music, a post he resigned in 1903 in order to teach at the Musical College in Chicago. He now devoted much of his time to a trio he had formed with the pianist Ganz and the cellist B. Steindl. On returning to Europe in 1906, he divided his time between Geneva and Berlin, and was always followed by private pupils, especially Americans. In 1908 he settled in London again to take up an appointment as professor at Trinity College of Music.

Sauret was one of the most characteristic representatives of the Franco-Belgian school of violin playing. He had a transcendental technique, a rich and individual tone and a very expressive vibrato. His repertory ranged from the classics to brilliant contemporary works: Bruch, Dvořák, Busoni and Moszkowski as well as Mendelssohn. As a composer, he was influenced by the German theorist Jadassohn, whom he had known in Leipzig. Most of his works, naturally, were for his own instrument, and they contain some pleasing original passages, to which he added transcriptions of Wagner, Mendelssohn and Rubinstein, as well as publishing new editions of classical technical studies.

Sauter, Eddie [Edward Ernest] (b New York, 2 Dec 1914; d Nyack, NY, 21 April 1981). American jazz arranger and composer. After studying at the Institute of Musical Art he became a member of Red Norvo's trumpet section in late 1935, and shortly afterwards, by mutual consent, the full-time arranger for Norvo's band. From 1939 he worked freelance, writing arrangements for such bandleaders as Benny Goodman (for whom he did his most notable work) and Artie Shaw, and established a strong reputation among musicians. His only period of public recognition (in the mid-1950s) stemmed from the success of a band assembled, initially for recording purposes only, by Sauter and Bill Finegan, formerly an arranger for Tommy Dorsey and Glenn Miller. Sauter continued as a freelance writer for stage, film and television, but also produced occasional pieces of 'absolute' music, such as Q.T. for the New York Saxophone Quartet.

Sauter's arrangements of popular song material for Norvo displayed a wealth of invention, and his deft handling of dynamics and unstilted counterpoint suggest an acquaintance with the methods of Duke Ellington. These elements were fully developed in his original works for Goodman, such as Benny Rides Again (1940, Col.) and Clarinet à la King (1941, OK). The lightweight character of the most popular recordings by the Sauter–Finegan Orchestra, such as Doodletown Fifers or Midnight Sleigh Ride (both on the album The Sauter–Finegan Orchestra, 1952, RCA, the latter an adaptation of the 'Troika' from Prokofiev's Lieutenant Kijé), should not obscure those orchestral and contrapuntal touches that foreshadowed the explorations of Gil Evans. If some of Sauter's work seems superficial, the best is a vindication of his versatility and sensitivity; in particular, his writing for chamber string ensemble on Stan Getz's album Focus (1961, Verve) represents one of the most convincing for chamber string ensemble on Stan Getz's album Focus (1961, Verve) represents one of the most convincing fusions of jazz and non-jazz elements. Further collaborations with Getz included the film soundtrack of Arthur Penn's Mickey One (1965) and the Tanglewood Concerto (1966, RCA).

DAVID D. BOYDEN/PETER WALLS

Sauveur, Joseph (b La Flèche, 24 March 1653; d Paris, 9 July 1716). French acoustician. In 1670 he went to Paris, where he attended the lectures of the Cartesian physicist Rohault; his works do not display the knowledge of advanced mathematics that characterizes the scientific progress of the age of Newton, although he held a chair of mathematics for a decade. He was elected to membership of the Académie des Sciences (1696), which left him free to develop his interest in acoustics. He thoroughly mastered the idea of frequency and was the first to interpret beats correctly. He also introduced the terms 'acoustique' (acoustics), 'son harmonique' (harmonic sound) and 'noeud' (node). His papers, though not so original as he may have thought them, were fairly clear and descriptive; they were very widely read, and certainly they had great effect upon the centrally important work of Daniel Bernoulli a quarter of a century later. He suffered from a speech defect and is said to have had no ear for music. His works include Principes d'acoustique et de musique (Paris, 1701/R). His papers were published in the Mémoires (incorporated in the Histoire) de l'Academie royale des sciences [1701–13] (Paris, 1704–16) and his work is described in the Histoires for those years.

Sauzay, (Charles) Eugène (b Paris, 14 July 1809; d Paris, 24 Jan 1901). French violinist. He entered the Paris Conservatoire and studied with Guérin and then Baillot from 1824; in 1827 he won the premier prix for violin. At the first concert of Habeneck's Société des Concerts du Conservatoire (9 March 1828) he replaced his indisposed teacher in the performance of a Rode concerto and thereafter regularly appeared as a soloist with the Conservatoire orchestra.

Sauzay played the second violin and afterwards the viola in Baillot's string quartet before its dissolution in 1840. He then formed his own group for chamber music with his wife (Baillot's daughter), Boëly and, later, Franchomme. In 1840 he was leader of the Musique du Roi, then leader of the second violins in the Musique de l'Empereur Napoléon III. In demand as a teacher as well as a performer, he taught a Conservatoire class from 1860 to 1892. Sauzay wrote studies and other pieces for the violin, also songs and two trios; some of the manuscripts are at the Conservatoire. His ballet music to Molière's Le sicilien (1881) is a Lully pastiche. His Etudes sur les quatuors de Haydn, Mozart et Beethoven was published in 1861, L'école d'accompagnement in 1869 (*R*1972) and Le violon harmonique in 1889.

DAVID CHARLTON

Savage, Henry W(ilson) (b New Durham, NH, 21 March 1859; d Boston, 29 Nov 1927). American impresario. He had a successful career in the real-estate business in Boston, where in 1894 a default forced him to assume control of the Castle Square Theatre. He organized a company there which opened on 6 May 1895; its modestly priced productions of opera in English were immensely successful. Over the next decade Savage's activities included productions in Chicago, New York and elsewhere; in autumn 1900, with Maurice Grau, he presented a season of opera in English at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, to great critical acclaim. The Henry Savage Grand Opera Company's English production of Parsifal in 1904 was a sensation and toured throughout the country for nearly a year. In 1906 a lavish production of Madama Butterfly (its American première) toured widely; the tour of La fanciulla del West in 1911 following its première at the Metropolitan was equally impressive. Savage also staged over 40 light operas, musical comedies and plays. His greatest success was Lehár's Die lustige Witwe (1907); other important productions included Gustav Luders's The Prince of Pilsen (1903) and The Sho-Gun (1904), and Emmerich Kálmán's Sari (1914). Savage's productions played a major part in popularizing opera and operetta outside the major urban centres. He was opposed to the promotion of particular singers as stars (particularly on financial grounds) and his exceptionally strong, reliable companies were the starting-points for many careers.

WILLIAM BROOKS

Savage, Jane (b ?London, 1752/3; d Camberwell, London, 9 Nov 1824). English composer, singer and virtuoso keyboard player, daughter of William Savage. She most probably received her musical training alongside her father's pupils: R.J.S. Stevens recalls trying out an early vocal trio of his with 'Miss Savage' and her father. She became an accomplished composer of keyboard and vocal music in the galant style typical of the late 18th century. Her music was probably written for the Savage family home, and she seems to have performed only in private. Her cantata Strephan and Flavia takes its text from a collection of poems published by her mother in 1777, and shows careful attention to details of word-painting. Savage published her music at her own expense, shortly before the death of her parents. She was her father's sole heir, her elder brother having already inherited an estate in Yorkshire from their mother. In 1793 she married Robert Rolleston at St George's, Bloomsbury, by which time she seems to have stopped composing.

RACHEL E. COWGILL

Savage, William (b ?London, 1720; d London, 27 July 1789). English singer, composer and organist. His teachers included Pepusch and Geminiani. Although not educated at the Chapel Royal (as claimed by Burney), Savage came to prominence as a boy treble soloist, singing for Handel's 1735 Covent Garden season in Athalia and Alcina, the role of Oberto in the latter being specially written for him. He retained a place in Handel's theatre company for the following season, and then took minor roles in Giustino (1737) and Faramondo (1738). By the time of Faramondo his voice was breaking: his character in the opera has no aria and, although his recitatives are written in the treble clef, Savage's name appears against the tenor stave in a coro movement. He sang as a bass in Handel's last London opera season of 1740–41, with roles in Imeneo and Deidamia, and performed in L'Allegro and Saul.

In the Covent Garden oratorio season of 1743 he took the part of Manoa in Samson and participated in the first London performances of Messiah. Burney described his voice as 'a powerful and not unpleasant bass', and the music that Handel wrote for him as a treble was well judged to display his youthful musical talents.

Savage is described as 'Organist of Finchley' in the subscription list to Greene's Forty Select Anthems (1743). On April 1744 he was admitted as a Gentleman-in-ordinary of the Chapel Royal, and on 5 April 1748 he succeeded Charles King as vicar-choral and Master of the Choristers at St Paul's Cathedral. As a teacher Savage influenced London professional musicians of the next generation, many of whom had probably been choristers at St Paul's. In 1777 he retired to Tenterden, Kent; he returned to London in about 1780 and attempted to re-establish himself as a music teacher, but did not regain his former eminence.

He wrote some short full anthems, one of them only 17 bars long, and verse anthems, in which he often favours minuet-style triple-time solo movements. 11 of his anthems, several of them dating from 1768, are settings of metrical psalms by Isaac Watts; four more, composed in 1772, have texts from Tate and Brady's psalter, and he supplemented these with a further 25 anthems, mostly in simple chordal style. His service settings are also mainly homophonic. However, he could on occasion produce more extended anthems with movements varying in style and texture, and his most ambitious work, O Lord my God (1784–6), is accompanied by string orchestra. His violin music, probably written while he was living away from London, includes one piece 'composed for Miss Augusta Smith'. His catches, rounds and canons were no doubt fruits of his membership of the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club and the Beef Steak Club. If much of his music gives the impression of being practical and tasteful rather than inspired, Savage's works nevertheless include some unusual items: he composed the song On the very first of May (1756) to nonsense verses by his wife, and he wrote an interesting Hallelujah (1770), 'An imitation of the singing at the Jews Synagogue on Duke's Place'.

DONALD BURROWS

Savagnone, Giuseppe (b Palermo, 27 Nov 1902; d Palermo, 28 Oct 1984). Italian composer. After studies in the organ, composition and philosophy in Palermo, he worked as choirmaster at the Greek theatre in Siracusa. He subsequently conducted operas in the theatres of Sicily and was assistant conductor at the Teatro dell'Opera in Rome (1928–35). He taught choral music at the Conservatorio di S Cecilia in Rome from 1940 to 1973. An eclectic composer, varying between traditional operatic realism and an interest in serial methods, Savagnone developed a harmonic theory which he called 'musical prismatism', based on the alternation of a limited number of intervals within a 12-note series. Practical application of this system is found in a variety of pieces: the Quartetto Preludio, recitativo e fuga, the Quartetto for wind instruments and tape, the orchestral Rifrangenze and the Sinfonia in De Alfa and the opera Né tempo né luorgo.

VIRGILIO BERNARDONI

Savall, Jordi (b Igualada, Barcelona, 1 Aug 1941). Spanish viol player and conductor. He studied the cello at the Barcelona Conservatory and the viol at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis with August Wenzinger; in 1973 he succeeded Wenzinger as teacher of the viol there. Quickly acknowledged as a master of the instrument, Savall has performed and recorded many of the masterpieces of the viol repertory, unearthing numerous forgotten works, notably by Marais. In 1974 he founded HESPÈRION XX with his wife, the soprano Montserrat Figueras, and other musicians of various nationalities, with whom he has given vivid, colourful performances of music ranging from the Middle Ages and the Spanish Renaissance to Purcell and Bach. On his return to Barcelona in 1987, Savall formed the vocal group the Capella Reial de Catalunya, with whom he has recorded works by Victoria, Francisco Guerrero, Cererols and Monteverdi. In 1989 he created the Concert des Nations, a period-instrument Baroque and Classical orchestra which brings together young musicians, mainly from Latin countries. Unanimously recognized as one of the most gifted and versatile performers of early music, Savall gained even wider recognition for his award-winning playing in the soundtrack of Alain Corneau's film Tous les matins du monde (1992). In 1988 he was created an Officier de l'Ordre des Arts et Lettres by the French Ministry of Culture, while many of his recordings have received international awards.

MARICARMEN GÓMEZ

Savart, Félix (b Mézières, 30 June 1791; d Paris, 16 March 1841). French scientist. He was trained at Strasbourg in medicine, taking a degree in 1816. He had long been interested in acoustics when, in 1816, he abandoned medicine and went to Paris, where he came under the guidance of Biot. He became a professor of natural philosophy in 1820 and was elected to the Académie in 1827, also obtaining an appointment at the Collège de France. He is known mainly for the Biot–Savart Law of Electrodynamics. His chief interest, indicated by the titles of his 27 papers (mostly published in the Annales de chimie et de physique), was in the study of vibrating bodies. These included important and often ingenious measurements of air, cords, bars, membranes, plates, solids of revolution and, particularly, vocal cords. He proposed theories of the vocal sounds of men and animals. His repetition and extension of Chladni's experiments with sand figures on vibrating plates and longitudinal bars led in the early 19th century to controversy over the velocity of sound in solids. In 1817, in an early acoustical experiment, he created a trapezoidal violin with straight sides and straight slits for soundholes, and in 1830 he produced a toothed-wheel siren, based on Robert Hooke's, for tone generation at controllable frequencies. His name was given to a now obsolete unit of pitch interval: one savart is equal to 3.99 cents.

Savary, Jean Nicolas (b Guise, Aisne, Sept 1786; d Paris, 9 Feb 1853). French bassoon maker and bassoonist. His father was the Paris woodwind maker known as a Savary père (fl *c*1798–*c*1827) comparatively, few of whose instruments survive. About an elder brother Savary fils aîné listed 1819 to 1837 variously as woodwind and string instrument/maker, nothing else is known. Jean Nicolas first trained as bassoonist under Delcambre at the Paris Conservatoire, winning a premier prix in 1808 and later becoming principal at the Théâtre des Italiens. He probably started making bassoons in 1816/17, in association with his father; by 1823 he had his own workshop, styling himself Savary jeune, and listed as 'fournisseur de la maison du Roi, de l'Académie et de l'école royale' and inventor of a model à coulisse mécanique and culasse à bascule. An instrument of this type, dated 1823, with five machine-operated tuning-slides fitted to the three lower joints and to the butt-knee, is at the Shrine to Music Museum, Vermillion, south Dakota. He fitted many of his instruments with a pioneering form of automatic crook-key mechanism and made early use of the key roller. His background as an excellent performer was undoubtedly of great practical value and helped him subsequently to become the most celebrated maker of his time both in France and England. His instruments, which he habitually dated, were unequalled for the sweetness and singing quality of their tone and remained in use and sought after by professionals, especially in London, for almost a century; Day called him 'the Stradivari of the bassoon'. Of his prolific output, 51 bassoons, eight tenor bassoons and one octave bassoon are listed by Young as surviving today. He did not participate in any of the Paris exhibitions. He had no workshop successor, his stock being sold after his death.

WILLIAM WATERHOUSE

Savary, Jérôme (b Buenos Aires, 27 June 1942). French actor, theatre administrator and producer. At five he was brought by his American mother to France, where he studied music (intending to become a drummer in a jazz band) and then atttended the Ecole Nationale Supérieure des Arts Décoratifs in Paris. At 19 he went to New York and plunged into the jazz scene there. Returning to France, he entered the theatre, firstly in the design department and then as a producer and administrator, founding the Compagnie Jérôme Savary in 1965 (renamed Grand Magic Circus in 1968). His first lyric productions were of Offenbach operettas (La Périchole, 1977, Hamburg; La vie parisienne, 1978, Frankfurt; and Le voyage dans la lune, 1979, Komische Oper, Berlin), where his sense of fun always enhanced rather than detracted from the music. Savary has continued to produce this genre all over the world with great success. Rossini has become another of his specialities (Il barbiere di Siviglia, 1987, Strasbourg Festival; Le comte Ory, 1988, Lyons, and 1997, Glyndebourne; L'italiana in Algeri, 1988, Strasbourg Festival, and La Cenerentola, 1993, Geneva, and 1996, Paris). But he has also produced the more serious repertory with imaginative and sometimes provocative stagings (Cherubini's Anacréon, 1983, La Scala; Don Giovanni, 1984, Rome; Die Zauberflöte, 1985, Bregenz Festival, and 1989, Vienna Volksoper; Les contes d'Hoffmann, 1987, Bregenz; Attila, 1991, La Scala; Carmen, 1991, Bregenz; War and Peace, 1991, San Francisco, and Rigoletto, 1996, Paris Opéra). In 1988 he became general director of the Théâtre National de Chaillot, Paris, where he produces both spoken and lyric theatre. His various books about his work include La vie privée d'un magicien ordinaire (Paris, 1985) and Ma vie commence à 20h30 (Paris, 1991), and he is the subject of a biography by C. Godard (Jérôme Savary: un enfant de la fête, Paris, 1996). In October 2000 he was appointed director of the Opéra-Comique.

CHARLES PITT

Savenko, Svetlana Il′inichna (b Moscow, 12 March 1946). Russian musicologist. After studying at the music school attached to the Moscow Conservatory (1960–64), she attended the conservatory itself (1964–9), graduating in musicology from the class of Kholopov. She subsequently undertook postgraduate studies at the conservatory with Yarustovsky and was awarded the Kandidat degree in 1978 for her dissertation Stil′ Stravinskogo kak yedinstvo ['Stravinsky's Style as a Unity']. She was a senior teacher from 1972 to 1981 in the music history department at the Glinka Conservatory in Gor′kiy [now Nizhniy-Novgorod], becoming professor in 1981, and was appointed Senior Scientific Officer at the Moscow State Institute of Art History in 1990. She became a professor in the department for the history of Russian music at the Moscow Conservatory in 1997. Her scholarly works are devoted primarily to Russian and foreign music in the 20th century.

INNA BARSOVA

Savetta, Antonio (b Lodi; fl 1600–41). Italian composer. He was a pupil of Tiburtio Massaino and succeeded him as maestro di cappella of Lodi Cathedral in 1609 (a year earlier he was described as 'presbyter'). He probably occupied this post for the rest of his life, though there was apparently an interruption, 1629–30, when it was held by Ignazio Donati. His output, apart from one volume of madrigals, consists of sacred music, the majority of it for the Mass and Offices. He did not adopt the new small-scale concertato style popular in northern Italy in the early 17th century, partly because masses and psalm settings tended to preserve larger scorings and partly because composers in the area around Milan, which includes Lodi, were comparatively impervious to the new style. Thus a fair proportion of his output is for double choir.

JEROME ROCHE

Savile, Jeremy (d ?1663–6). English composer. John Playford listed him among 'many excellent and able Masters' as a teacher 'For the Voyce or Viole' in his Musicall Banquet (1651). He was a member of the Old-Jewry Musick Society after the Restoration, though Playford did not list him as such in The Musical Companion (RISM 1667[6]), possibly because he was by then dead. In addition to glees printed in The Musical Companion (1667[6], 1672[5]) and elsewhere, a few of his ayres were included in Select Musicall Ayres and Dialogues (1653[7]); they range in style from the charming triple-time setting of Stanley's I will not trust thy tempting graces (ed. in MB, xxxiii, 1971) to the rather rambling declamation for Carew's No more, blind boy. His most celebrated song is Here's a health unto his majesty. (SpinkES)

IAN SPINK

Savin, Risto [Širca, Friderik] (b Žalec, Slovenia, 11 July 1859; d Zagreb, 11 Dec 1948). Slovenian composer. A high-ranking Austrian army officer by profession, he studied composition privately in Vienna (1892–6) and Prague (1897–9). He began writing in a classical Romantic style, which soon developed into neo-Romanticism, incorporating elements of Impressionism; his first works affected thus were the lieder. As a composer for the stage he was the first Slovenian to adopt wholeheartedly the principles of Wagnerian music drama. Of his three operas, Lepa Vida ('The Fair Vida') and Matija Gubec are the most popular. The Fair Vida can be described as the first neo-Romantic Slovene opera, though it was with Matija Gubec that Savin reached his creative peak; here the Romantic principles are expressed in consistently symphonic form, and the work is his greatest achievement in terms of expression and originality. Although echoes of Wagner and Strauss can be heard in Savin's works generally, his operas are not of a cosmopolitan character, but are imbued with the southern Slav spirit.

MANICA ŠPENDAL

Savinio, Alberto [Chirico, Andrea de] (b Athens, 25 Aug 1891; d Rome, 6 May 1952). Italian composer, writer and painter. A brother of the painter Giorgio de Chirico, he studied the piano in Athens and then privately with Reger in Munich. In 1910 he moved to Paris, where he made friends with members of the Parisian avant garde, including Apollinaire, Breton, Cocteau and Picasso. At the outbreak of war he returned to Italy and in 1917 helped establish dadaism, contributing to Tristan Tzara's review Dada. In the 1920s and 30s his output of writing and painting broadened. He settled in Rome in 1935, and from 1946 contributed articles on music and other subjects to the Corriere della sera and Corriere d'informazione. Savinio composed most of his music during an early period to 1915, and then in his last years from 1948 to 1952. He first engaged in music theatre with the melodrammi Carmela (1908) and Poema fantastico (1909), later destroyed, probably by the composer. The first extant, though incomplete, theatrical work was Le trésor de Rampsénit (1912), inspired by the story of the rich Egyptian Pharaoh Rampsen, followed in the next two years by the one-act works La mort de Niobé, orchestrated in 1925, and Les chants de la mi-mort. These works explore the conflict between drama and music with recourse to bitonality, collage and prefigurings of brutalism, converging with the literary and visual avant garde of the time. The final period of Savinio's musical creativity includes two one-act works, Agenzia Fix and Orfeo vedovo (both 1950), as well as Cristoforo Colombo (1952). With the weight of Savinio's literary experience behind them, these operas tend to bridge the gulf between music and word, shunning the influence of painting and returning to tonality and a new smoothness, thus realizing, with the assistance of surreal settings, the ideal of a metaphysical theatre.

Savinio's stage work also included the ballets Persée (to a subject and choreographed by Fokine) and Deux amours dans la nuit, both from 1913; from a later period, and to the composer's own subjects, are Ballata delle stagioni (1925) and the one-act Vita dell'uomo (1948). Of his surviving non-stage works, the collection of songs Chants étranges of 1914–15 is notable for its ironic detachment and terse poetic style approaching that of Satie and Apollinaire. While Savinio's musical output is small in quantity, it holds an important position within his overall work as an avant-garde artist of originality. His writings, collected in the posthumous Scatola sonora (Milan, 1955), are of some considerable literary value; in them Savinio upholds the 'unknowable quality' of music and outlines an aesthetic vision that resists classification, falling halfway between rational classicism and metaphysical Romanticism.

RAFFAELE POZZI

Savio, Johann Baptist (fl 1760s). Austro-Bohemian composer. He became music director to Joseph von Brunian's theatre company some time before Brunian took over the Kotce Theatre, Prague, in 1764. Savio's name does not occur after 1768, though his inclusion in J.J. Stankovský's novel Vlastencové Bondy ('Patriots at the Bonda Theatre'; 1878), where he figures as Brunian's second in a duel, shows that he was not entirely forgotten. The earliest record of Savio as a composer names him as author of the music to the arias of Le diable à quatre, ou La double métamorphose (Der Teufel in allen Ecken, oder Die zweyfache Verwandlung), an opéra comique translated from the French by C.L. Reuling and performed by Brunian's company (libretto, Prague, 1760, in CZ-Pu). This work may have been performed in Vienna in the previous year. Garnier also named Savio as the composer of Die Zigeuner, oder Der von List und Liebe besiegte Geiz (libretto, Graz, 1766), Erdmann's Philint und Cleone, Nuth's Die doppelte Ehe, Unger's Der nach sieben Jahren beglückte Bräutigam, Kurz-Bernardon's Der vergötterte Bernardon (1764) and F.W. Weisskern's version of Bastien und Bastienne, first performed at the Kärntnertortheater, Vienna, on 5 May 1764. Felix Berner's company included all these works in its repertory in the early 1770s. Although Savio's Singspiele were quite widely performed in the 1760s and 1770s (Prague, Vienna, Brno, Graz and probably elsewhere), no score is known to survive. Despite his italianate name it is more likely that his music was Austro-German in style, since Brunian strove to regenerate the Prague theatre and Berner also put the emphasis on native works.

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Savioli, Alessandro (b Parma, 12 Aug 1544; d after 1623). Italian composer. He was born in the parish of S Maria borgo Taschieri. He apparently spent his early years in Parma, since his first book of five-voice madrigals is dedicated from there, and his earliest known published work, the canzonetta Mentre campò contento l'arso core, was in the first book of Canzonette alla napolitana (RISM 1591[22]) of his fellow Parmesan Giovanni Battista Massarengo. From the title-pages of his second and third madrigal books it can be assumed that he was maestro di cappella at S Alessandro, Bergamo, from at least 28 August 1597 to 8 February 1600. Between 1614 and 1616 he was maestro di cappella at Salò, where he was responsible for reorganizing the choir and increasing the number of salaried singers.

Savion. See FEDELI family.

Savioni, Mario (b Rome, 1606–8; d Rome, 22 April 1685). Italian composer, singer and teacher. He received the traditional training of a choirboy under Vincenzo Ugolini and sang for him at S Luigi dei Francesi, Rome, from 1617 to about 1621. He then served as a boy soprano from 1621 in the Cappella Giulia at S Pietro, and in 1626 as an alto. He later assisted Ugolini and his successor Orazio Benevoli at the French church (1631–44) and capped his career as an alto in the Cappella Sistina (March 1642 to 1667). He sang in his first opera, Filippo Vitali's Aretusa (Rome, 1620) as a child and appeared in other Roman court operas in 1642 for Cardinal Antonio Barberini and in 1666 for Queen Christina of Sweden. A note of *c*1640 to Cardinal Mazarin in Paris from his father calls Savioni the best teacher of voice at the court of Rome (Prunières, 57). He composed the music for S Agnese, an opera presented privately by the Pamphili family in their Roman palace in 1651.

Savioni was a major figure in the first generation of Roman composers of Italian chamber cantatas; his works appear in the earliest layer of cantata sources dating from before 1660. He was more rarely anthologized in sources from the next 15 years, and was not among those Roman composers, such as Carissimi and Luigi Rossi, whose fame continued posthumously. Among the poets he set were Domenico Benigni, Luigi Ficieni, Francesco Buti, Giovanni Lotti, Giovanni Ciampoli, and Francesco Melosio, most of whom were associated with the Barberini family. Savioni's settings range from strophic ariettas to lengthy multipartite structures in a wide range of moods, from the standard pathetic laments to healthy cheerfulness and outright comic parody. His melodic and harmonic styles have a rare clarity and stability, with an easy breadth of line. Enhanced by a lively sense of metre and graceful ornaments, his arias demand a good upper range and vocal agility. These aspects also characterize his spiritual and sacred compositions. The solo motets display a more florid style, typical of their genre, than do his cantatas. Florid and descriptive writing, recitative and aria styles, combine to narrate the story of David and Goliath in his solo motet Congregantes Philisthei (1659[1]). The compositions called 'madrigals' are possibly sections that originally closed spiritual cantatas destined for performance at Roman oratories. Italian cantatas 'per oratorio' in the Barberini library present a series of solos and ensembles, typically closing with a 'madrigal' for the full complement of soloists. Three lost scores called oratorios are attributed to him; texts only are extant for La caduta di Vasti and Santa Margherita (in I-Rv). Any of these spiritual works may have been the dialogues he is said to have composed for Innocent X about 1649 (Ciliberti, 241).

MARGARET MURATA

Šavli, Peter (b Postojna, nr Ljubljana, 7 Sept 1961). Slovenian composer. He studied music education (BA 1985) and composition with Srebotnjak (MA 1988) at the Ljubljana Academy of Music. From 1988 to 1993 he worked as a music teacher. In 1993 he received a scholarship to travel to the USA, where he studied composition with Bresnick, Druckman and Anthony Davis at Yale University; in 1995 he moved to Cornell University to undertake doctoral studies and to work as an assistant lecturer. In his music Šavli pays particular attention to the relationship between the horizontal and vertical. His musical structures are designed around the internal organization of related series of sounds.

MATJAŽ BARBO

Savonese, Il. See CHIABRERA, GABRIELLO.

Savoy (i) (Fr. Savoie; It. Savoia). A mountainous region (formerly a county, then a duchy) in south-east France, which included parts of present-day Italy, France and Switzerland (see map). The house of Savoy assumed power in 1003 and held the Italian crown from 1860 to 1946. The court took a leading part in the European development of music during the second quarter of the 15th century, sharing with nearby Burgundy a critical role in the early development of Renaissance styles.

Medieval and Renaissance music of the region illustrates both Franco-Burgundian and Italian characteristics. Numerous Provençal troubadours (e.g. Elias de Barjols, Arnaut Catalan and Aimeric de Belenoi) were connected with the Savoyard court in the 13th century, and poems by Savoyards (e.g. Tommaso II di Savoia, Albertet de Savoia and Nicoletto da Torino) show that they quickly adopted the new art. Minstrelsy flourished during the 14th and 15th centuries, its vestiges probably contained in some Piedmontese folksongs of later collections. The local language also appears in 15th-century laude, canzoni and sacre rappresentazioni. Medieval chant and music theory manuscripts survive at Aosta, Chambéry, Asti, Ivrea, Novara, Turin and Vercelli.

Amadeus VIII (1391–1451), first Duke of Savoy, extended his territory and was a lavish patron of the arts in the manner of the Burgundian dukes. He himself played the organ, and the court enjoyed extravagant tournaments, banquets and festivals, such as that at Chambéry in 1434 when Amadeus's son, Louis, married Anne of Cyprus. The courts of Burgundy and Savoy were both present; Du Fay was maître de chapelle, and it was probably on this occasion that he met Binchois, a meeting recorded by Martin Le Franc, poet and secretary to Amadeus. Amadeus left minor court duties to Louis in 1434, when he retired to a hermitage. Du Fay returned to Savoy and is listed on the register of Louis' musicians from 1437 to 1439. In 1439 Duke Amadeus was elected Antipope Felix V by the Council of Basle. Although Du Fay temporarily severed his ties with Savoy, many other musicians, including Brassart and Nicolas Merques, were associated with the council. Large sections of manuscripts (I-AO 15 and I-TRmp 87 and 92) probably preserve repertories valued at the antipope's court; these manuscripts, among the most prized collections of Burgundian repertory, contain much music by Du Fay and are the two most important surviving sources for Binchois' sacred works. Felix V abdicated in 1449; Du Fay visited Savoy again in 1450, and served Duke Louis there (1450–56).

Louis (d 1465) and Anne continued the splendour of earlier court life, maintaining a chapel with ten to 23 adult singers, six to eight boys, and several chaplains, priests and organists; this was also the pattern for subsequent generations. The Chansonnier Cordiforme (F-Pn 2973), probably copied in the 1470s, was made locally and contains numerous chansons by leading composers of that period; its special value lies in anonymous unica which illustrate two local stylistic practices, Franco-Burgundian and Italian. Musical patronage was particularly vigorous at the turn of the century, during the rule of Duke Philibert II and his wife, Margaret of Austria. One of Margaret's celebrated chansonniers (B-Br 11239) most probably originated at the Savoyard court; another local manuscript (I-Tn I.27) includes chansons and sacred Latin pieces. Composers brought to the court at this time included Brumel, Févin, Therache, Longueval and Lodovico Fogliano.

After the death of Philibert II (1504) and the departure of Margaret (1507) the prosperity of the duchy declined, although the chapel survived and regained much of its splendour by the end of the Renaissance. Instrumentalists also continued to perform at the court, and violinists are known to have played there as early as 1523. Violin making and solo and ensemble playing later became specialities of the region. If the bassadanza roll dated 1517 (Archivi Biscaretti, Turin, Mazzo 4, no.14) was made locally, it anticipates the area's significant achievements in dance during later centuries. Printers at Turin brought out various liturgical books, one of the graduals (Porris, 1512) having been formally dedicated to Duke Charles III. The Genevan Psalter, first printed in 1542 with Jean Calvin's endorsement, strongly influenced numerous subsequent Reformation movements. The court settled at Turin in 1563; its rich patronage of music, theatre and dance was thereafter connected with that city. See also BURGUNDY and TURIN.

DAVID CRAWFORD

Savoy (ii). American record company. It was founded in 1942 in Newark, New Jersey, by Herman Lubinsky; among its first issues were items recorded in 1939 by the Savoy Dictators, inaugurating a substantial jazz catalogue which made Savoy one of the most important independent labels of the 1940s. From 1945 to 1952 artists introduced to the label included several from the emerging bop school: Charlie Parker, Dexter Gordon, Fats Navarro, J.J. Johnson, Serge Chaloff and Miles Davis. The results of these sessions are now among the most highly prized recordings of the style. Nevertheless the most successful parts of the catalogue were recordings of swing, and of jazz with a strong beat and blues feeling that later came to be categorized as rhythm and blues. Early on, it also occasionally offered sessions of hillbilly, classical and ethnic music.

An office was opened on the West Coast in 1948 and Savoy then began purchasing other labels including Regent, National, Bop and Discovery. In addition the company leased a large amount of important jazz from small organizations and reissued the catalogue of the Jewell label. The emphasis of the company's recording policy was then altered to concentrate on more commercially orientated types of African-American music; gospel music and rhythm and blues appeared on the Gospel, King Solomon, Sharp and World Wide labels established in the mid- to late 1950s. Meanwhile jazz remained important under Ozzie Cadena, who instigated LP reissues of major recordings of the 1940s and organized important bop sessions by Kenny Clarke, Cannonball Adderley and Yusef Lateef.

Fred Mendelsohn was responsible for Savoy's development of the largest catalogue of black gospel music, including many recordings by James Cleveland; jazz and other secular music now began to figure less prominently. Surprisingly, the company nevertheless recorded isolated free-jazz sessions by Sun Ra (1961) and Bill Dixon and Archie Shepp (both 1964). Lubinsky died in 1974; the following year the catalogue was purchased by Arista which began a programme of reissues, continued by Muse in the late 1980s. In the 1990s Denon acquired the catalogue and began a series of miniaturized 'facsimile' CD reissues of classic Savoy LPs.

Savoy Orpheans. English dance band. Formed under the leadership of Debroy Somers in 1923, it played at the Savoy Hotel, London; it succeeded the Savoy Quartette (1916–20) and survived the Savoy Havana Band (1922–7) into the 1930s, being entirely reconstituted several times. The early members included Cyril Newton, who briefly assumed the leadership in 1926, Carroll Gibbons, who became musical director in 1927, Rudy Vallee, Billy Thorburn and Reg Batten. The New Savoy Orpheans under Batten and the Original Savoy Orpheans under Gibbons and Teddy Sinclair were disbanded after less than a year (1928); other groups were formed with the same name, but independent of the hotel, until Gibbons began another engagement there with the Savoy Hotel Orpheans (1931). The hotel discouraged outside engagements but the Orpheans and the Havana made over 300 records between 1922 and 1927. The Orpheans were among the most popular British dance bands of the period and had a pioneering role in radio broadcasting. Their repertory was largely functional dance music with a few 'hot' jazz numbers.

Saw, musical (Fr. lame musicale; Ger. singende Säge). A folk instrument of mid-19th-century origin that gained popularity as a novelty on the music-hall and vaudeville stages. It consists of a flexible handsaw played by drawing a fiddle bow across the straight edge of the blade or striking the blade with a soft mallet. The saw handle is held between the knees by the seated player, who with the left hand grasps the tip of the blade, controlling the pitch frequency of the fundamental mode of vibration by flexing the blade to a greater or lesser degree. Vibrato is produced either by the hand or by a quivering of the leg. In the 1920s saws of extra length (up to 81 cm, some providing a three-octave range) were manufactured specially for musical use, but these did not displace the carpentry saw, selected at the factory for its musical properties; the two types are not always distinguishable.

The saw is capable of beautiful and haunting music. It is used in Russian folk music and in rural music in parts of the USA. From the late 1960s an annual saw players' festival was held in California, at first independently, later as part of a larger folk music festival. An annual festival has also been held in Guangzhou, China, where the instrument has achieved some popularity. The instrument's tendency to portamento was exploited by Henri Sauguet in his Plainte (1949) for lame musicale and piano. Shostakovich used it in his First Piano Concerto of 1933 (the part is usually played by a violin) and George Crumb in his Ancient Voices of Children (1970).

In the Hornbostel-Sachs classification the musical saw is reckoned as a friction idiophone.

Sawallisch, Wolfgang (b Munich, 26 Aug 1923). German conductor and pianist. He took piano lessons from childhood and began studies in theory and composition at school. After training at the Musikhochschule in Munich he was engaged in 1947 as a répétiteur at Augsburg, where he made his conducting début in Hänsel und Gretel and became first conductor. With the violinist Gerhard Seitz he won first prize for duos at the 1949 Geneva International Competition, and began to conduct as a guest in Germany. He became general music director at Aachen (1953–8), Wiesbaden (1958–60) and Cologne (1960–63), where he also directed the conductors' class at the academy. He opened the 1957 Bayreuth Festival with Tristan und Isolde and made two London débuts the same year, first as the pianist in a lieder programme with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, and later as a conductor with the Philharmonia. He was concurrently principal conductor of the Vienna SO from 1960 and the Hamburg PO from 1961. His American début was on a tour with the Vienna SO in 1964, and in 1971 he was appointed Generalmusikdirektor of the Staatsoper in Munich, with which he made his Covent Garden début during its 1972 London season. He remained in the post until 1992, when he left amid mounting controversy over his artistic management. The following year he became musical director of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Sawallisch has continued to play as a pianist in lieder programmes and occasionally performs as a concerto soloist. His conducting is distinguished by its scrupulous care for phrasing and balance and its architectural command, sometimes at the expense of colour and intensity of feeling. He is at his finest in the opera house, above all in Richard Strauss, and has made notable recordings of Capriccio, Intermezzo, Die Frau ohne Schatten and Elektra. Equally impressive are his recordings of Tannhäuser and Die Meistersinger, and the masses and shorter choral works of Schubert. Sawallisch's many orchestral recordings include the complete symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert and Mendelssohn, the latter in editions prepared by himself.

NOËL GOODWIN

Sawer, David (Peter) (b Stockport, 14 Sept 1961). English composer. At the University of York he blossomed both as a composer and as a participant in contemporary music-theatre pieces. Further studies with Kagel confirmed his tendency to define each piece in novel theatrical terms, often with reference to the visual arts and particularly surrealist imagery. A Fulbright Scholarship (1992) enabled him to continue his studies in the USA, and his compositional career was supported by further awards, a residency with the Bournemouth SO and numerous commissions that have resulted in impressive works for the concert hall, dance, film, theatre and radio. His 50-minute radio composition Swansong (1989), a collage of orchestral, choral and electronic sounds, conjuring the musical utopia envisioned by the dying Berlioz, was the BBC's entry for the Prix Italia and subsequently won a Sony award.

If Sawer's early work reflected a variety of influences – from Stravinsky to Ligeti and Berio – these have been shed, gradually, as he matured. Certain characteristics remain from his early music: for instance the blurring of background and foreground in his first orchestral work, Trompe l'oeil (1982; since withdrawn), was later put to good use in Byrnan Wood, commissioned for the 1992 Proms.

Sawer has described himself as a 'theatre person who writes music', and he shares with Birtwistle a fondness for ritual: for example, his Trumpet Concerto is a sequence of four ritual dances depicting the mythical combat between Hercules and Antaeus. Also similar to Birtwistle is Sawer's fondness for musical mechanisms. Etudes (a product of his studies with Kagel) and succeeding ensemble works like Cat's-Eye (which captures the erratic fits and starts of an 18th-century magic lantern) and Take Off (inspired by photographs of the Wright brothers' experiments in controlled flight) might be compared with Oskar Schlemmer's theatrical activities at the Bauhaus. Each demonstrates an uncanny ability to generate interlocking structures by means of repetition and ostinato, free imitation and canon, without any sense of constriction, a quality later seen in Tiroirs. Sawer's music draws a similar type of inspiration from contemporary art, for instance the shadowy, irrational perspectives of a De Chirico painting that prompted the piano piece, The Melancholy of Departure.

MEIRION BOWEN

Sawerthal. See ZAVRTAL family.

Sawtry. See PSALTERY.

Sax. Belgian family of wind instrument makers, of whom the second in line was probably the most remarkable innovator ever to enter the trade.

(1) Charles-Joseph Sax [Sax père] (b Dinant [now in Belgium], 1 Feb 1790; d Paris, 26 April 1865). A skilled workman, he seems to have taught himself the craft of wind instrument making. In 1815 he established a factory for brass and woodwind instruments in Brussels. His products soon attracted notice; in the same year he received a court appointment and was entrusted with supplying instruments for certain Dutch Army regiments then in the course of formation. Instruments bearing his mark figured at the Paris Exposition of 1867. In addition to producing the standard instruments of the period, and a clarinet with the 'spectacle' b/f♯″ key designed by (2) Adolphe Sax, Charles-Joseph Sax devised a valveless 'cor omnitonique' in 1824 and patented an improved version in 1846. He also obtained Belgian protection for an improved system of 'cylinders' applied to the ophicleide. According to Pontécoulant (Organographie, Paris, 1861, ii, p.369) Sax's 'omnitonique' idea of 1824 was patented in France in 1826 in the name of Stuckens (presumably a patent agent), and in 1834 its originality was challenged by Meifred and Deshays, thus foreshadowing the mass of litigation that was later to bedevil the life of his son.

(2) Adolphe [Antoine-Joseph] Sax (b Dinant, 6 Nov 1814; d Paris,4 Feb 1894). Son of (1) Charles-Joseph Sax. He made his first acquaintance with musical instruments in his father's workshop, and soon acquired exceptional skill. As a student at the Brussels Conservatory (flute and clarinet), he added the player's experience to that of the instrument maker. His inventive talent was tremendous; his business acumen certainly less so. A great deal has been written about him, both during his lifetime and since, much of it unreliable and contradictory, for he attracted both violent partisans and bitter enemies. It seems that he was of a somewhat quarrelsome, certainly litigious temperament, and through excessive self-esteem may have brought on himself some of the troubles that marked his later years. Nevertheless, he had much to be proud of, and in several directions his influence was profound.

The first of his recorded instruments are flutes and an ivory clarinet, shown at the Brussels Industrial Exhibition of 1830, and a clarinet with no fewer than 24 keys made in 1834, which he played and exhibited in 1835. In 1838 he patented a bass clarinet which surpassed any then extant, and it was probably about this time that he began the work which led finally to the saxophone. Feeling the need of a wider scope than he found in Belgium, distressed by family bereavements and disgusted by the withdrawal on a specious pretext of a major award at the 1841 Brussels Exhibition, Sax decided to go abroad. Having declined offers from London and St Petersburg, he moved to Paris in 1842, where he lost no time in seeking influential contacts, first among them Berlioz, who did much to recommend the young man and his ideas. Others who assisted him were Rossini, Halévy, Meyerbeer and Fétis.

Once settled in a modest workshop, Sax began to manufacture standard brass and woodwind instruments of superb quality, soon introducing improvements of his own as well as devising new instruments. The range of this work is illustrated by the French patent records of the next ten years: the families of saxhorns (1845) and saxotrombas (1845); the saxophones (1846; see SAXOPHONE, fig.2); an attachment for the military bugle to give it a chromatic compass (1849); a bassoon on 'rational' lines (1840, 1851); an improved trombone (1852); and an original system of six independent valves for brass instruments (1852). He put his inventive powers to practically every band and orchestral instrument, devising, among other things, kettledrums without shells, a double bass tuned in 5ths and an improved piano. He also experimented with concert-hall acoustics and conceived other musical and non-musical ideas, some of them bizarre. Sax left no proper account of how he arrived at the idea that eventually became the saxophone, but there is a strong possibility that it came about through experiments begun in Brussels to improve the unstable tones of the ophicleide. To demonstrate his various instruments Sax formed a small band of competent musicians which performed regularly at his factory, often before persons of note.

By 1845 the central authority was showing concern about the declining standards of French army music, and early in that year Sax addressed himself to the Minister of

Instrument factory of Adolphe Sax in Paris: engraving from 'L'illustration' (5 February 1848)

War, Count Rumigny, with proposals for reform incorporating the use of his own instruments, some designed expressly for service conditions. A commission of enquiry was set up under the presidency of the minister which resulted in a public contest on 22 April between a band of 38 directed by Sax and a much larger military band of the traditional constitution. The judgment of a large and representative jury resulted in the official adoption of Sax's instruments and gave him what was virtually a concealed monopoly in French military music.

The début of a young, active and ambitious foreign rival was not well received by the older established instrument makers in France, and almost at once Sax found his activities obstructed by them. Certainly he was not above producing his own version of the ideas of others. Quite early he adopted the 'Berliner Pumpen' of WILHELM WIEPRECHT and Moritz, for example. Nevertheless, extreme measures were taken by some of the Paris makers. Sax was subjected to vicious press campaigns; his best workers were tempted away by higher salaries; a mysterious fire destroyed part of his factory; he was even attacked physically. It was not long before the law was invoked, and suits for nullity of his patents were preferred. For the remainder of his life he was involved in a series of lawsuits, some initiated by him in retaliation, and on his death some remained unsettled. One such was that instituted by the Lyons maker Rivet, probably instigated by others. Here nullity was claimed on the grounds that in the saxhorns the bore dimensions had been established in previous instruments, the principle of the piston valve had been worked out by Blühmel (see VALVE (i)) and the general shape of the instruments had already been adopted by other makers. Sax won this case, but lost many others. The lawsuits ruined him (he was declared bankrupt in 1856 and again in 1873, although he persisted in his work with great fortitude) and several of his attackers. It is said that Sax's achievements in military music, for which he was decorated by France and several other countries, deprived some renowned makers of their principal outlet, among them Raoux, Labbaye, Halary and Besson, and led to the premature closure of their businesses. After Sax's death his sons continued the business under more peaceful conditions, and one of them, Adolphe-Edward Sax (1859–1945), became director of the stage band at the Opéra, a post which his father had held from 1858 until his death.

Of Sax's major inventions only the saxhorn and the saxophone achieved lasting use. The saxophone was appreciated from the first by both civil and military musicians and instruction in the instrument under the direction of the inventor himself was added to the syllabus of the Paris Conservatoire in 1858. The class, however, was suspended in 1871 and not reinstated until 1942, when it was re-formed under the direction of the virtuoso player Marcel Mule. A quartet of saxophones has become standard in the wind band. Its inventor could never have imagined the popularity that would come to the saxophone as it came to symbolize the spirit of 'The Jazz Age' after World War I. The notoriety and prejudice thus engendered in 'legitimate' circles against the instrument had, happily, evaporated by the end of the 20th century.

Through the influence of the Distin Family Quintet in the middle of the 19th century, the saxhorn in its various sizes laid the foundation for the British brass band, which soon spread to other countries, keeping alive Sax's concept of a set of instruments homogeneous in design and technique (see BAND (i)).

(3) Alphonse [Antoine] Sax (b Brussels, 9 May 1822; d Paris, 26 June 1874). Son of (1) Charles-Joseph Sax. He began a musical career as flute lauréat at the Brussels Conservatory. After a short period in business in that city he joined his brother in Paris in 1844. In 1860 he set up independently, but after a quarrel with Adolphe over 'ascending pistons' at the 1862 London International Exhibition his business declined; he was declared bankrupt in 1864. He was involved with and patented many non-musical inventions but sank into obscurity after 1867.

PHILIP BATE/WALLY HORWOOD

Saxhorn. A family of valved brass instruments developed by Adolphe Sax at his workshops in Paris in the 1840s and 50s. The name 'saxhorn' became a generic description for the instruments of this family. Sax adopted this term, but there is evidence that he was not the first to use the word as a broad descriptor. Patents for valve brass instruments having names with the 'sax' prefix were registered by him in Paris in 1845, but the validity of some of the patents, at least in so far as they protected a genuine new invention, has been questioned at different times. The patents were fiercely challenged by some long-established French instrument makers during Sax's lifetime, but these challenges could have been stimulated by protective instincts and by jealousy of the rapid success of a self-confident, emigrant Belgian. Intended primarily for army use, the saxhorn revolutionized military, and in particular brass, bands.

The terminology of the larger brass instruments is very confused since they appeared in many different countries at different times in the early 19th century; hence classification on any but very general lines is difficult. Different makers adopted the proportions which seemed best to each, and gave their products fanciful names. Only in France is the term 'saxhorn' still applied to the entire group, while in Britain, where instruments of the species are an essential and defining feature of brass bands, they are known by names such as TENOR HORN and baritone (see BARITONE (ii)). In other countries, the word saxhorn is now applied so loosely as to have no real significance. Sax himself, at least in his early years in Paris, did not use the term to describe a group of inventions. In his 1845 patent he used 'saxhorn' only to indicate one type of instrument to which his invention could be applied, and otherwise used terms such as 'saxotromba'. But The Illustrated London News of 7 December 1844 reported a concert by Jullien, in which the Distin family played 'Sax Horns' which 'were invented by M. Sax of Paris, but have been greatly improved by the Distins'.

1. Construction. 2. History.

1. CONSTRUCTION. Saxhorns have a tapered bore – except through the valves and ancillary passages which are necessarily cylindrical (though Sax patented some designs which continued conically through the valve channels) – with a fairly rapid expansion in the last section, leading to a bell of only moderate flare. (In the hands of American makers, the bell has been considerably enlarged.) The main tube has a fairly large bore relative to its length, together with many of the proportions associated with the French type of bugle (which some authorities regard as the parent instrument of the type); indeed this similarity was one of the bases on which legal appeals against Sax's patent were founded. The scale of the bore is not quite so large as that generally recognized as definitive of the tuba group (see TUBA (i)).

When blown with a rather deep cup mouthpiece saxhorns easily sound their natural notes, from the 2nd natural note (with all valves operated) to the 8th natural note or higher, and this is generally regarded as their practical compass. On most of them their fundamental (or pedal) note can be sounded, but it is often uncertain and of poor quality when longer valve-tube lengths are brought into play. This has led some writers to make the distinction (which is of little use) between 'whole-tube' and 'half-tube' instruments. The need for the complete pedal octave on deeper saxhorns seems to have been felt quite early, and very shortly after their introduction Sax enlarged the bore of the larger members to improve that part of their compass. In so doing he sacrificed some measure of tonal homogeneity in the group but gained other advantages. Since the usual three valves, tone, semitone, and minor 3rd, can together only bridge the gap between the fundamental and the 2nd natural note to the extent of a diminished 5th, an additional valve and tubing for two and a half tones was called for, which Sax soon provided. The result was a complete family of instruments, the names and sizes of which are given in Table 1.

The tonal distinction between the euphonium (tenor tuba) and the baritone (see BARITONE (ii)), both used in British brass bands and standing in the same nominal pitch, has tended to be less pronounced in some parts of the world. American makers and their followers build euphoniums to a narrower scale than that favoured in Britain and France. Brass basses are also built with up to six valves and of such proportions as to make their ultimate parentage, tuba or saxhorn, difficult to determine (assuming, that is, that such parentage continues to have meaning).

Saxhorns, in common with all other valved instruments, suffer from two acoustic defects with which players cope instinctively. The unavoidable use of a proportion of cylindrical tubing in the valve slides disturbs the regular taper of the bore to an extent dependent on the number of valves in use at any one time; this modifies the harmonic content of the sound to a variable degree. In the first saxhorns the ancillary valve tubing was coiled in circles, a feature that was said to be acoustically advantageous, but it prevented the use of telescopic tuning-slides or a device for the disposal of condensed moisture. The second and more serious defect is an increasing sharpness when two or more valves are used together; for though the extra tube added by one valve may be sufficient to lower the open notes of the main tube by the required amount, it will be insufficient to produce the same degree of lowering if the main tube has already been lengthened by another valve (see VALVE (i)). This trouble can often be corrected by the player's lip technique, but on the longer instruments some form of mechanical compensation is desirable. This is supplied automatically by such valve systems as Blaikley's, or (at the discretion of the player) by special supplementary valves bringing in short extra lengths of tubing. Mechanisms have also been designed by which valve slides may be pulled out against the bias of return-springs whenever two or more pistons are depressed together, but these seem to have been short-lived. In the early 1850s, Sax sought to apply to the 'saxhorn' a system of 'pistons ascendants et descendants' or 'pistons a tubes independents'. The system was patented in 1856. The effect of this arrangement is that the valves, when used one at a time, successively shortened the air column in semitone ratios. Thus by using the open tube or any one of the valves the player had at his disposal seven different harmonic series spaced a semitone apart and eliminating the need for the compensation inherent in any 'additive' valve system.

In general shape and appearance, most modern saxhorns, wherever made, present a strong family likeness. The tubing is usually folded in the manner of a large trumpet, and with the bell directed upwards the mouthpipe projects more or less at a right angle. In Germanic instruments the coiling is more strictly elliptical. The bell stands vertical, but in some American designs it is tilted sharply forward from the plane of coiling. According to Carse, Sax originally planned his whole group with forward-directed bells, but very shortly changed to the upright form as depicted in Kastner (see illustration). Later, however, he reverted to the more familiar horizontal trumpet shape for the soprano and alto members. Saxhorns have either piston or rotary valves, and both seem equally efficient.

2. HISTORY. The achievement in the second and third decades of the 19th century of a fairly satisfactory valve mechanism had a profound effect on the manufacture of brass instruments. Such instruments were to gain ascendancy over those with the side-hole system, with its large padded key cups and somewhat vulnerable levers. In many parts of Europe between 1830 and 1850 makers devoted themselves to applying valves to conically bored instruments of all sizes. Some attempted to add them to tubes of bugle or ophicleide proportions, but others designed entirely new instruments.

In 1842 Sax, who was formerly associated with his father's factory in Brussels (see SAX family, (1)), came to

Saxhorns from J.-G. Kastner's 'Manuel général de musique militaire' (Paris, 1848): (a) saxhorn in E♭; (b) saxhorn in B♭; (c) saxhorn in A♭; (d) saxhorn in E♭; (e) saxhorn in F and E♭; (f) saxhorn in E♭

Paris and established himself as a maker of both brass and woodwind. With the support of a few notable patrons, in particular Berlioz, who had encouraged his move to Paris, he was soon a successful maker, to the annoyance of a number of long-established Parisian firms. A man of great ambition and inventive capacity, Sax secured a large number of patents, but it is now difficult to assess the true value of some of his ideas.

On settling in Paris one of Sax's first activities was to design what was to become known as the saxhorn. The principle involved was not entirely new, having been utilized in the French CLAVICOR and various German types of horn some years earlier. The proportions adopted by Sax, however, undoubtedly made his instrument superior. In 1845 Sax patented designs which were the basis of the saxhorn species, and in that year he wrote to the Minister of War, Count Rumigny, drawing his attention to them. At that period French military music in general was in decline and long due for reorganization. As a result of the deliberations of a commission headed by Count Rumigny himself, and after a public contest between an established military band and a smaller group of Sax's instruments directed by the inventor, the latter were officially adopted. Thus Sax secured what was virtually a concealed monopoly as supplier to the French army. At that time the saxhorn group ranged from soprano to bass, but within a year or so a sopranino and a contrabass in B♭ had been added, as well as some intermediate sizes. Provision was also made for the use of detachable transposing crooks which was at that time the custom with the cornet. By 1855 a giant contrabass or 'bourdon' in E♭ had been constructed; this monster is now in the Musée des Arts et Métiers in Paris.

Sax's claim that his products were something entirely new in the field of music was hotly contested by a number of other manufacturers who denied strongly that they embodied anything in the nature of a protectable invention. Powerful representations by 34 leading Parisian makers were made to the government for the annulment of the brevets of 1845. The result was a long series of lawsuits and counter-suits which contributed to the ruin of several famous houses and of Sax himself. He was declared bankrupt three times, yet with incredible fortitude he remained in business. The evidence suggests that Sax's claims were extravagant, even arrogant, but against this must be set his achievement in bringing order to a class of instruments which was developing elsewhere in a hopelessly irregular manner. The standards of workmanship he introduced were beyond reproach and, throughout his life, he seems to have been genuinely obsessed with the concept of consistency of tone quality.

Saxhorns were originally made in Sax's workshop; they were sold by agents such as Distin. After Sax's success in defending his patent, a number of other French makers were permitted to make saxhorns under licence. After the patent expired in 1865, makers in France and elsewhere were free to make their own saxhorns, which did not always closely resemble Sax's models.

The earliest saxhorn illustrations we have, apart from drawings in the 1845 patent (reproduced in Horwood, 2/1983, p.30), are those given by Kastner (1848, reproduced here) and from these it seems that the first valves were of the stout 'Berliner Pumpen' type. These were designed by Wieprecht in Berlin and first made there by Moritz; it was the former's contention that Sax's valves were based on those of certain instruments that he or his father had purchased from Moritz. The two men met in 1845 and as a result Wieprecht concluded that it would not be worth his while to try to obtain legal redress. Although Sax does not seem to have been above producing his own version of other men's ideas it must be remembered that in his day, and for many years after, international recognition of patent rights hardly existed. Later saxhorns were provided with the slender 'Périnet' valves and some surviving examples have the rotary valve.

Sax was particularly fortunate in the artists who first played his instruments publicly. In 1844 the DISTIN Family Quintet (the leading British virtuoso brass quintet) visited Paris on a concert tour during which their attention was drawn to the first experimental saxhorns. Their admiration was unbounded and resulted in a commission for a set of instruments which was completed in the same year. Those instruments became the regular equipment of the group. There are conflicting accounts of the relationship between the Distins and Sax, but it is possible that Henry Distin's version given to Enderby Jackson, the historian of brass bands, in 1895 is accurate. It is quoted at length by Russell and Elliot. Henry Distin claimed that it was he who coined the generic description 'saxhorns'. Whether this is true or not, it is certain that it was the efficiency that characterised instruments of Sax's design, and the acquisition by Distin of the British agency for them, that were the key factors in the development of the amateur brass band movement. From about 1845 the brass band started to become a widely dispersed working-class activity. The Sax-Distin relationship came at a moment in British history when social, demographic and economic conditions provided a new and fertile market for these instruments, which were durable, relatively easy to play and could be purchased through deferred payment schemes. Many Victorian brass bands were called saxhorn bands and in 1853 the first great 'open' contest at the Belle Vue Gardens, Manchester, was won by the Mossley Temperance 'Saxhorn' Band which, it was alleged, was entirely equipped with instruments of the Sax design. All the instruments imported for this band were of the upright form, including even the cornets, which Sax also supplied. They were pitched mainly in A♭, which later caused difficulties when B♭ and E♭ became the standard pitches in contests. The Mossley instruments were obtained through Henry Distin who later became a manufacturer in London although he retained the Sax agency for a number of years.

In spite of his championship of saxhorns in Great Britain, Distin must bear some of the blame for the confusion between them and the large-bore tubas. The saxhorn had been used widely from the mid-1840s, when Distin had taken the franchise for Sax's instruments. However, the Distin trade catalogue of 1857 – by which time he had lost the Sax franchise – is remarkable for the avoidance of the words 'Sax' and 'saxhorn'. Although the influence of Sax on the design of brasswind is pervasive, the document gives the impression that, on losing the Sax agency, Distin felt the need to find new names for the instruments. The bell-forward instruments are 'Flugel horns' or 'chromatic horns', and words like 'tuba' and 'euphonion' are used to describe the bell-up forms. It is likely that Distin's considerable influence lies behind many of the terms which are now common for brass instruments in Britain.

Saxophone (Fr. saxophone; Ger. Saxophon; It. sassofone). A single-reed wind instrument invented by the Belgian-born maker Adolphe Sax (see SAX family) in about 1840, and granted a 15-year patent in 1846. Sax originally intended the instrument for use in orchestras and military bands. The saxophone combines a single-reed mouthpiece with a wide-bore conical tube of metal. Acoustically, it behaves as do other cone-bodied reed instruments, 'overblowing' at the octave to yield a second register (see ACOUSTICS, §IV, 6).

In the Hornbostel-Sachs classification the saxophone is classed as a clarinet.

1. Construction and manufacture. 2. Compass. 3. Technique. 4. History and use.

1. CONSTRUCTION AND MANUFACTURE. The saxophone has a conical body providing a resonating air column, widening out in the ratio of about 1:5·5, expanding at the open end into a small flare (bell). In the 19th century and sometimes the 20th the tube was often parabolic in shape, but nearly all saxophones are now made with a straight cone. The instrument has 22 to 24 relatively large note-holes (each being between 40% and 60% of the respective diameter of the bore). In addition, there are two smaller holes for overblowing, the one closer to the mouthpiece coming into operation from a″. All the holes are controlled by keys. Sax met the requirements of a key-mechanism that would be as simple as possible but would function reliably in any fingering combination by amalgamating elements of the Boehm system with the simple systems of the clarinet and oboe. Some of the keypads are fingered directly on soldered fingerplates (the main fingering and the short B♭ key), others on simple or articulated levers (see KEYWORK).

As the larger saxophones are of some considerable length they have from the beginning been made more manageable by introducing a U-bend, usually in the region of the third lowest hole and tilting the bell slightly forward, while the section above the main note-holes is made as a detachable crook (neck) gently curved through nearly a right angle. From the baritone size downwards, further shortening is secured by double folding at the upper end. The neck comes into direct contact with the blowing mechanism, and, as the first section of the air column, influences the tonal parameters. Because of this, many manufacturers offer necks of different measurements or materials. The soprano and sopranino saxophones are made in both straight and curved versions. Soprano saxophones have increasingly been sold with interchangeable straight and curved necks. One German manufacturer, Julius Keilwerth, and one American, L. A. Sax, make straight alto and tenor saxophones.

The sound-producing element on a saxophone is a single beating REED which operates on the same principal as that of the clarinet (see CLARINET). The mouthpiece may be made of ebonite, wood, metal, plastic or glass. Metals used include brass, bronze, copper, high-grade steel, silver and sometimes aluminium; wood and glass are less common. The operational criteria of the mouthpiece are the dimensions of the inlet and the internal shaping of the mouthpiece as well as its material. Medium-sized inlets are generally used and are suitable for most styles of saxophone music, but for special purposes – and depending on the force exerted – they may be narrower or wider. Sax designed a mouthpiece with a long, relatively narrow inlet, and excavated to form a chamber. Such mouthpieces, in conjunction with the parabolic tubes of early saxophones, produce a soft, warm and tender tone of fine timbre that combines well with other sounds. Large ensembles, however, require that the tone of the saxophone be emphasized more; this can be achieved by narrowing the mouthpiece chamber and by changing its interior design. Traditionally, saxophone mouthpieces are made to slide over the end of the mouthpipe, which is lapped with thin cork sheet to make an airtight joint; this allows a small amount of in-and-out movement which serves for fine tuning. Mouthpieces and instruments of different periods are not always compatible. Saxophone reeds are usually made of natural fibres such as arundo donax (see REED) although plastic reeds are also available. The strength of the reed influences the tonal colour, technical characteristics and dynamic area of the saxophone. The reed is secured to the mouthpiece with a metal ligature (although new designs of ligatures made of other materials have also been made available).

Saxophones are complex musical tools consisting of over three hundred separate parts, most of which have to be assembled by hand. Adolphe Sax used brass for his saxophones, and the majority of modern instruments are still made of this alloy. Some firms make sections of the body, or all of it, of copper, bronze or precious metals such as silver. Besides making professional instruments, some manufacturers also offer semi-professional saxophones and models for learners. In the last few years the variety of surface finishing has become much greater.

The parts of the tube (the neck, the main tube, the U-bend and the flare) are cut out of sheet metal from patterns and worked into form or bent, hammered and soldered over a mandrel. The flare is shaped in a spinning lathe or a hydraulic device. Rubbing with a lead ring over a mandrel gives the main tube its final conical shape. The note-holes are stamped out and planed or seamed. After the preparation and assembling of the small struts and supports the keywork is fitted and again subjected to surface treatment. The final assembling and checking process is then carried out, and both the mechanical and the acoustic functions of the instrument are tested. Last of all the state of the surface is closely inspected.

Since the mid-20th century saxophones have been manufactured in all parts of the world; there are firms in Brazil (Weril), Japan (Yamaha; Yanagisawa), mainland China and Taiwan, as well as Europe and the USA.

2. COMPASS. Saxophones were conceived as a family of instruments, although the terms used to distinguish between the different sizes did not develop until later. Military band instruments were pitched in E♭ and B♭, orchestral ones in F and C. The latter kind are no longer made. Each group comprised the seven sizes of sopranino, soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, bass and contrabass. With the exception of the soprano instrument in C, all saxophones are transposing instruments. The standard (written) compass today is b♭–f‴ or f♯‴. In Sax's original design the compass was b–f‴. Baritone saxophones for professional performance usually have a lengthened tube with a low A key. Some saxophones also have a g‴ key. (Sounding compasses of the saxophone family are shown in Table 1.)

At the request of musicians, saxophones with an extended compass have sometimes been made, e.g. tenor instruments with a range of three octaves and alto saxophones with a four-octave range. For example, the saxophonist André Beun used a hole bored in the mouthpiece (with a special key to close it) as a third hole for overblowing, and thus, while retaining the normal fingering, he was able to play his instrument a 6th higher. Special flageolet fingering can extend the range of traditional saxophones by about one to one and a half octaves upwards. The intonation and colour of the highest register clearly depend on the type of construction, the combination of mouthpiece and reed, and the performer's skill. Alto and tenor saxophones are by far the most frequently played sizes, followed by the soprano and baritone instruments. The sopranino, bass and contrabass saxophones are not played very often. At the end of the 20th century the contrabass (in E♭) was made only by the Italian firm of Orsi.

3. TECHNIQUE. Saxophones are held by a neck strap, although sopranino and soprano instruments can be played without this aid, like a clarinet. Because of their great weight, baritone and bass saxophones can be mounted on a frame with rollers enabling them to be moved into any comfortable position for performance. In line with the usual practice of European wind instruments, the left hand is placed above the right, closer to the mouthpiece. The right thumb has no key to manipulate but is used to support the instrument. The left thumb rests on a plate and operates the octave mechanism. The closing of the main keys 1 to 3 by the left hand and 1 to 3 by the right hand ('six-finger fingering') produces (written) d′. The note-holes and keys are arranged so that when the fingers are continually taken away an ascending melodic D minor scale (without the closing tone) is produced. The same fingering produces d″ to c♯‴ with the addition of the octave keys. There are four more note-holes, which are operated by the little fingers, to extend the range down to b♭. Since the saxophone produces d‴–f‴ (also f♯‴ and g‴) not by second-stage overblowing with partial use of the basic fingering, but by further shortening of the resonator tube in first-stage overblowing mode, there are four to six note-holes for this purpose in the upper part of the body.

The saxophone is blown in much the same way as the clarinet, but the mouthpieces of the two instruments differ, and saxophone reeds are rather broader. (In principle, a soprano saxophone reed will vibrate at the same register of a B♭ clarinet, and vice versa, but whereas the soprano saxophone reed measures about 14 × 32 mm, that of the French clarinet is about 13 × 31 mm). The blowing resistance of the saxophone is rather less than that of the clarinet, with a slightly greater through-put of air at the same time. Hardly any other wind instrument can produce such different timbres, ranging from the silky, tender tone of classical saxophone playing to the full sound of mainstream jazz and the aggressive sound of the rock and fusion musicians. The determining factors are the saxophonist's own style and the kind of mouthpiece and reed fitted, rather than the type of saxophone used.

4. HISTORY AND USE. The nine Belgian patents taken out between 1838 and 1842 by Charles-Joseph and Adolphe Sax in Brussels, for improvements to various different kinds of wind instruments, are indicative of the atmosphere of innovation in which the saxophone was invented about 1840. Having assisted in his father's workshop and trained as a musician, Adolphe Sax was very familiar with problems in the manufacturing and use of the wind instruments hitherto available. His attempts to eradicate displeasing tonal differences and disproportions between brass and woodwind instruments by finding a new timbre led to the trial of various combinations, particularly in bass ophicleides.

It is therefore not surprising that the prototype of a new bass wind instrument 'invented' by Adolphe Sax, according to J.-G. Kastner as the result of sudden inspiration, should have been a combination, modification and extension of elements familiar from the construction of brass and woodwind instruments: a metal body resembling that of the bass ophicleide with an extended keywork mechanism, combined with a modified mouthpiece like that of the bass clarinet. Sax first described the new instrument as a 'new ophicleide' or 'ophicleide à bec', and wrote that it was 'intended to replace the ophicleide'. The instrument was introduced for the first time as a 'saxophone basse en cuivre' at the second Brussels Industrial Exhibition of August 1841; the term saxophone has been in general use since Berlioz described it by that name in June 1842.

Sax then set about the development of a saxophone family from the original bass model. By the time the bass saxophone was first officially performed in public, in the première of Kastner's biblical opera Le dernier roi de Juda (1 Dec 1844), there were already several other sizes of the instrument. However, it was not until 21 March 1846 that Sax applied for a French patent for 'a new system of wind instruments, called the saxophone'. His claim comprised the following new features: a metal body in the form of a parabolic cone; a mouthpiece with a single reed and a much enlarged interior; a range of instruments in eight sizes; and a series of keys derived from those of the flute and clarinet, with two octave keys. After some changes to the sizes and their descriptions, the series of gradations used to describe the family was established in 1850 as follows: sopranino, soprano, alto, tenor, baritone and bass. The compass during this pioneering period of development was between two and a half and three octaves.

As a musician, Adolphe Sax was also the first to promote his new instrument. He introduced it in 1841 in Brussels and 1842 in Paris, played it in public on various occasions in 1844, and in 1845 organized (and won) a public competition between his 'systems' and traditional brass band instruments. From 1846 to 1848 saxophones were used for teaching purposes at the Gymnase Musical Militaire in Paris. In 1853 Sax founded an ensemble of his own with five saxophones. In 1854 he had the instrument reintroduced into French military bands, and he himself taught a saxophone class for military bandsmen at the Paris Conservatoire from 1857 to 1870. From 1858, as a publisher, he encouraged the composition and distribution of works for his range of saxophones. His invention won him the highest awards at all the Paris Expositions until 1867.

Many French composers and music critics appreciated the musical opportunities offered by a new instrument, and at this early period they were enthusiastic in describing their impressions of the sound of the saxophone; the instrument was praised for its tonal compass and the quality and boundless variety of possible nuances. It was said that the saxophone's wealth of sound (full, soft, sonorous, powerful) placed it beyond comparison with other musical instruments then in use. According to Kastner (Manuel général de musique militaire, 234–5), Adolphe Sax had created > an instrument with an entirely new sound – powerful, far-reaching, expressive and beautiful. With its unique tonal quality, it offers the best imaginable link between the very high voices of the orchestra and the very weak ones or those with a very uneven timbre . . . Uniting strength and charm, it does not drown out the one kind and cannot be drowned out by the other – it is a perfect instrument.

Berlioz emphasized the grand, almost priestly sound of the lower register, and said that the saxophone was 'the finest voice we have' for works of a solemn nature.

After a five-year extension of the period during which it was protected by patent, the saxophone became free for general development in 1866. From that time on, other French manufacturers were permitted to make saxophones, and they developed and patented their own models. Two fundamental changes to the basic model and its component parts were the adoption of the combination of keys and the fingering of Boehm clarinets in the left hand by Goumas (1875), as well as the introduction of automatically selected octave keys, and rollers on the little-finger keys, by Lecomte (1888). Major makers of the saxophone (besides Sax) during the first 100 years of its existence included the French firms Millereau/Schoenaers (1866–1928), Gautrot/Couesnon & Cie (1868–1980), Buffet-Crampon/Goumas/Evette & Schaeffer (from 1868), Dolnet (1880–1984), Pierret (1906–73), Selmer (from 1921), and Leblanc (from 1920); in the USA, Conn (from 1888), Buescher (1894–1963), and King (1916–66); the German firms Adler (1902–52), and G.H. Hüller (1921–53); and the Czech maker Kohlert (1900–45).

The saxophone began to be taught at music colleges and conservatories, such as Paris (1857–70, but not again until 1942), Brussels (from 1867), Lille (from 1879), Berlin (Stern Conservatory from 1902; Musikhochschule from 1931), and Trinity College of Music, London (from 1931). At first the instrument was taught by clarinettists, with the aid of gramophone records, or was very often self-taught from printed tutors, which were thus of great significance for the acceptance and distribution of the saxophone. Most 19th-century saxophone tutors were published in Paris; these include works by Kastner (1846), Victor Cornette (*c*1854), L.-A. Mayeur (1868, 1879 and 1896) and H.E. Klosé (1877–81). The spread of the saxophone to other countries (Germany, Britain, the USA) is reflected in the range of tutors that appeared in the early 20th century, including works by: Victor Thiels (Paris, 1903 and Leipzig, 1929); John Fitzgerald (London, 1904); N. Fedorow (Leipzig, 1907 and 1926); Benjamin Vereecken (New York, 1917); Kathryn E. Thompson (Los Angeles, 1922); Gustav Bumcke (Hamburg, 1926); Rudy Wiedöft (New York, 1927); Ruby Ernst (New York, 1928); Ben Davis (London, 1932); Jimmy Dorsey (New York, 1934); and Erich Rochow (Berlin, 1941). Many of these writers were also noted performers (L.-A. Mayeur, Victor Thiels, Gustav Bumcke, Rudy Wiedöft and Jimmy Dorsey). Rudy Wiedöft (1893–1940) is referred to by some as the father of saxophone playing in the USA and considered to be one of the most revered saxophonists ever to take up the instrument. Other outstanding soloists to emerge during the 19th century and first half of the 20th include the Europeans Henri Wuille (1822–71), William Wooton (1832–1912), Marcel Mule (b 1901), Sigurd Rascher (b 1907), Michael Krein (1908–66), and Ingrid Larssen (b 1913), and the Americans Edouard A. Lefèbre (1834–1911), Elisa Hall (1853–1924), Jascha Gurewich (1896–1938), Sidney Bechet (1897–1957), Bennie Krüger (1899–1967) and Cecil B. Leeson (b 1902).

Some 150 compositions for saxophone are known to have been written by 1930; after that date the achievements of Mule, Rascher and Leeson caused the number of compositions for and with saxophone to rise considerably. However, the saxophone has remained something of a minority instrument in the orchestra. Following the example of Adolphe Sax's own promotion of his instrument, the formation of saxophone quartets (Mule, 1928; Bumcke, 1931) encouraged the composition of new chamber music works for quartets or similar ensembles, by Glazunov in 1932, Pierné in 1934, Rivier in 1938 and Bozza in 1939. Orchestral works and operas which incorporate saxophones in the score include: Ambroise Thomas, Hamlet, 1868; Bizet, L'Arlésienne, 1872; Massenet, Hérodiade, 1881, and Werther, 1892; Strauss, Symphonia domestica, 1902–3; Milhaud, La Création du monde, 1923; Gershwin, Rhapsody in Blue, 1924; and Ravel, Bolero, 1928. Solo concert pieces for saxophone have been composed by Gilson, 1902; Florent Schmitt, 1918; Debussy, 1904/1919; Borck, 1932; Hindemith, 1933; Ibert, 1934; Glazunov, 1936; and Frank Martin, 1938. By 1994, Londeix and Ronkin could list, among other pieces, some 250 solo concertos with orchestra, 2100 works for saxophone and piano, and 300 original compositions for saxophone quartet.

Saxophones were also employed in military bands from the time of their invention. French bands initially had two saxophones as standard (1845–8); this number rose to eight after 1854, but dropped back to four in 1894. Different countries employed varying numbers of saxophones; in the European military band competition at the Paris Exposition of 1867 the Parisian Garde performed with eight, the Garde Impériale with six, the Imperial Russian Band with eight, and the Dutch and Belgian bands with four saxophones each. In Italian military bands three saxophones were introduced in 1901; statistics for 1884 mention eight saxophones in Spanish bands and as many as ten in Japanese bands. Saxophones did not become standard in German and Austrian military bands until 1935, when they were first introduced into the Luftwaffe wind band. Around the turn of the century saxophone quartets also played with regimental bands in the garrison towns of Karlsruhe (1896), Diedenhofen (1896), Potsdam (1898) and Berlin (1905); there was a saxophone sextet in Chemnitz, and other military bands had one or two saxophones. In the USA, the success of the Paris military band with its six saxophones at the peace celebrations in Boston in 1872 inspired P.S. Gilmore, bandmaster of a New York military band, to include saxophones in his own ensemble in 1873, with E.A. Lefèbre as soloist. Sousa added three saxophones to his band in 1892. In general, however, American military bands had only alto and baritone saxophones around the turn of the century, adding a tenor instrument in 1911 and a bass in 1920.

3. Herb Geller

Military and touring bands, circus and music hall performances all contributed to the dissemination of the saxophone before the First World War, and its popularity grew so much in the USA after 1918 that there was said to be 'a veritable epidemic of saxophone mania'. Saxophones were recommended as the ideal musical instrument for old and young, home and church, beginners and advanced performers, and they were produced to a high standard of quality and sold in large quantities. Unusually talented soloists such as Wiedöft and Krüger encouraged this trend with their popular gramophone records in the 1920s, and saxophone bands with up to 100 players existed. Saxophones became increasingly prominent in the field of jazz after about 1920. Their use became characteristic of Kansas City jazz, a style that developed around 1925 and produced such outstanding soloists as Lester Young (1909–54), Coleman Hawkins (1904–69) and, later, Charlie Parker (1920–55). When the Big Bands became popular in the swing era of the 1930s, saxophones were among their leading instruments. Performers who came to prominence in the 40s and 50s include Julian 'Cannonball' Adderly (1928–75), John Coltrane (1926–67), Herb Geller (b 1928; fig.3), Lee Konitz (b 1927), Emil Mangelsdorff (b 1925), Gerry Mulligan (1927–96), Bud Shank (b 1926) and Phil Woods (b 1931). Jazz and classical saxophonists of the next generation include Bill Evans (b 1958), Jean-Yves Fourmeau, Frederick Hemke, Bernd Konrad, Dave Liebman (b 1946), Jean-Marie Londeix, Branford Marsalis (b 1960), Leo van Oostrom, Paquito d'Rivera, Eugene Rousseau and Heiner Wiberny.

Since the 1960s the saxophone has become increasingly popular in both amateur and professional contexts, and has been increasingly used also in pop and rock music, one of its main assets being that it offers very individual expressive possibilities. Excellent teaching materials for both classical and jazz performance, and the constant improvement in the availability of tuition, are enabling more and more people of different ages to take up the saxophone. Conferences have been held by the World Saxophone Congress since 1969, and periodicals and journals are published. Artistic standards continue to rise, and technical improvements continue to be made. Younger players in particular are increasingly able to combine classical, jazz, rock and other styles into their music, and additional techniques such as the use of multiphonics and microtones continue to be explored. The Centre Européen de Saxophone opened in 1995 in Bordeaux, which aims to collect and store in its archives as many sources as possible relating to the instrument, with the emphasis on the position of the saxophone in classical and contemporary art music.

Saxorusofono (It.). Term coined by Orsi in 1937 to describe the ROTHOPHONE.

Saxotromba. A family of valved brasswind instruments devised principally for the use of mounted military bands by Adolphe SAX and patented in 1845. The bore profile of the saxotromba was probably intermediate between the 'cylindrical' bore of valved trumpets and trombones and the more conical bore of the smaller saxhorns, but the lack of any surviving instruments which can positively be identified as saxotrombas precludes precise characterization. The instrument was held vertically in front of the performer. Saxotrombas were pitched in B♭ and E♭, with an additional member in F designed to replace the french horn in military bands. Saxotrombas did not survive long, and had disappeared from the inventories of French cavalry bands by 1867. For further information and illustration see G. Kastner: Manuel général de musique militaire (Paris, 1848/R), 380, pl.xxi.

PHILIP BATE/ARNOLD MYERS

Saxton, Robert (b London, 8 Oct 1953). English composer. From the age of nine until his mid-teens, he was given occasional composition lessons by Britten, and from 1970 to 1974 he had regular lessons with Lutyens. He studied at Cambridge (BA 1972–5) and Oxford (BMus 1975–6, DMus 1992), with, among others, Holloway and Sherlaw Johnson, and subsequently with Berio. In 1976 Saxton was awarded first prize at the Gaudeamus music week in Holland, and in 1986 he received a Fulbright Fellowship to study at Princeton University. He was appointed head of composition at the GSM in 1990, then similarly appointed at the RAM in 1998; in 1999 he became lecturer at Oxford University.

Saxton's intellectual and musical breadth has led him to draw on a range of influences, central to which has been the model of Schoenberg. Carter, Lutosławski and Boulez have been other exemplars of rigorous thinking about the personal compositional process, and in the creation and control of intricate musical textures, a feature of Saxton's earlier orchestral and chamber music, such as Choruses to Apollo, Ring of Eternity, The Sentinel of the Rainbow, culminating in the Chamber Symphony 'The Circles of Light'. In these pieces foreground motivic gestures project a middleground succession of coordinating intervals, underpinned by the assertion of nodal pitches often placed a tritone apart. The dynamic experience of the music is generated through the shift in prominence towards or away from these individual points of focus. Messiaen's additive rhythms and his view of music as a natural medium in which to express the numinous played a part in these pieces, as too did the ecstatic, visionary works of Tippett, Vaughan Williams and Holst.

In his later music, Saxton has moved to a more mainstream idiom that directly re-engages with issues of tonality and thematic identity, but whose surfaces remain conditioned by his experience of modernist texture and processes. While Britten's reworking of traditional procedures can perhaps be detected as one influence of this newer style, so also are the proportional schemes, polyphonic structures and layered textures of Tudor composers such as Dunstaple, Tallis and Byrd. Their influence (and that of Berg's Lulu) is evident in the tempo relationships that underline the structure of the opera Caritas (1991) – an exploration of the nature of religious belief and its destruction through dogma – and in the move to the tightly focussed textures of Invocation, Dance and Meditation for viola and piano (1991), At the Round Earth's Imagin'd Corners for choir (1992), Canticum luminis for chorus and orchestra (1994) and Songs, Dances and Ellipses for string quartet (1997).

A continuing characteristic of Saxton's style is a kind of musical anthropomorphism, in the manner of Carter. The string concertos, for example, exhibit relationships between the respective solo instruments and accompanying orchestras which evolve like those of characters in a drama. Saxton's connection to his Jewish roots is also strongly articulated by the sometimes isolated aspect of the solo instrument in the concertos, and more generally by a use of dance as an expression of ecstasy drawing from the Hassidic tradition, and in the choice of imagery evident from titles and programmatic elements. His music has drawn freely on texts from other traditions too, including Lucretius's De rerum natura and the metaphysical poets Donne and Vaughan.

Sayão, Bidú [Balduina] (de Oliveira) (b Rio de Janeiro, 11 May 1902; d Lincoln, ME, 12 March 1999). Brazilian soprano. She studied with Jean De Reszke in Nice; returning to Rio de Janeiro in 1925 she sang Rosina at the Teatro Municipal in 1926, repeating the role at the Teatro Costanzi, Rome, subsequently appearing at both Paris houses (1931), at the Colón and in Italy. In 1937 she enjoyed a tremendous success as Massenet's Manon on her début at the Metropolitan (1937), initiating a New York career that lasted until 1951 in lyric and coloratura soprano roles such as Gilda, Rosina, Gounod's Juliet, Mélisande, Violetta, Mimì, Norina, Adina, Zerlina and – perhaps most memorably – Susanna. She exuded feminine charm, warmth and refinement on stage, singing with pure, silvery tone and enlivening soubrette roles without recourse to soubrette mannerisms. In addition to concert appearances (many with Toscanini), she gave frequent recitals. Her many recordings, which include Zerlina, Susanna, Juliet (with Björling) and Manon, show the vitality, delicacy and pathos of her readings.

MARTIN BERNHEIMER/ALAN BLYTH

Saygun, Ahmet Adnan (b Izmir, 7 Sept 1907; d Istanbul, 6 Jan 1991). Turkish composer, conductor and ethnomusicologist. He began his musical career by singing in the chorus of his elementary school and he took piano lessons from the age of 13. In 1925 he became a music teacher in elementary schools, and from the next year he taught in high schools. Having won a contest organized by the Ministry of Education, he left for Paris in 1928 to study music.

Saygun's first teacher at the Paris Conservatoire was Eugène Borrel; later he attended Vincent d'Indy's composition classes at the Schola Cantorum. In 1931 Saygun returned to Turkey and began to teach counterpoint at the Music Teachers School. In 1934 he became conductor of the Ankara Presidential SO, but he had to resign because of his failing hearing. From 1936 to 1939 he taught at the Istanbul Municipal Conservatory. In 1939 he was appointed inspector of Halkevis (cultural institutions), an appointment which enabled him to travel throughout Turkey and to conduct extensive research into Turkish folk music; in this work he collaborated with Bartók (his study Béla Bartók's Folk Music Research in Turkey was published, ed. L. Vikár, in Budapest in 1976). From 1946 Saygun taught composition at the Ankara State Conservatory, and he was a member of the Turkish Radio and Television Organization Executive Board. Among his many honours and awards were the Atatürk Art Prize (1981), the Grand Prize of the Turkish ministry of culture (1984) and the Pro Cultura Hungarica Prize (1986).

Saygun was the most prominent figure of the group known as the Turkish Five. He was considered an important authority on folklore, but parallel with this scholarship he maintained a rich creative inspiration; thus he is equally notable for his compositions and for his scientific research on music. He was a member of the executive board of the International Council for Traditional Music and he received several medals from abroad for his research work; he contributed the article 'La musique turque' to the Encyclopédie de la Pléiade. His compositions reflect an expression which is a blend of Romanticism and Impressionism, but in his later works he tried to apply more recent developments.

Saygun was the first Turkish composer to write operas after the foundation of the republic, but the work that brought him fame was the oratorio, Yunus Emre, which illustrates lines by the 13th-century Turkish mystical poet Yunus Emre. The work was completed in 1946 and was performed that year in Ankara, in 1947 in Paris and in 1958 in New York, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski. The majority of Saygun's works have been published by foreign houses and some have been recorded. His opera Köroğlu is often performed by the Istanbul State Opera.

FARUK YENER/MÜNİR NURETT İN BEKEN

Saylor, Bruce (Stuart) (b Philadelphia, 24 April 1946). American composer and writer. He studied composition with Weisgall and Sessions at the Juilliard School (BM 1968, MS 1969), with Petrassi at the Accademia di S Cecilia, Rome (1969–70), and with Perle at the Graduate School of CUNY (PhD 1978). He has taught at New York University (1976–9) and at Queens College, CUNY (1970–76, from 1979), held various offices in the League of Composers, ISCM (1973–8) and CRI (from 1979), and served on the advisory board of The Yard, a dance, music and theatre project in Chilmark, Massachusetts (from 1979). From 1992 to 1994 he was composer-in-residence for the Lyric Opera of Chicago. Among his honours are awards from the National Society of Arts and Letters (1968), the NEA (1976, 1978), the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters (1976, 1983), the Guggenheim Foundation (1982–3) and the Ingram Merrill Foundation (1991). He has received commissions from the Houston Symphony Chamber Orchestra, the Yale SO, the Pennsylvania Opera Festival, The Yard and the Contemporary Trio. Many of his vocal works have been performed by his wife, the mezzo-soprano Constance Beavon. He has also collaborated with Jessye Norman, who sang his cantata O Freedom! at the inauguration of President Bill Clinton in 1997. In much of his music, Saylor has built 12-note structures around focal 'tonics'; Four Psalms closely weaves the timbres of the voice and flute around central pitches. Songs from Water Street, a setting of five poems by James Merrill, are lovely evocations of the images in the poems. As a writer and critic Saylor has contributed to the study of Cowell's music and is the author of The Writings of Henry Cowell (Brooklyn, NY, 1977).

Sayne, Lambert de. See SAINNE, LAMBERT DE.

Sayve [Saive, Saibe, Sainne, Sayfe, Seave, Seef, Seyve], de. South Netherlandish family of musicians and clerics. The first member known is Raskin de Seave, a burgher of Liège, whose two sons were musicians.

(1) Mathias [Mathieu] de Sayve (i) (b ?Liège, *c*1540–50; d ?Bohemia, 1619). Singer and composer, elder son of Raskin de Seave. He was appointed second succentor at the collegiate church of St Martin-en-Mont, Liège, on 9 July 1571, and held the post at least until 1588. By 1 January 1590 he was an alto in the chapel of Emperor Rudolf II in Vienna, and in 1593 he was Monte's deputy as choirmaster. According to Vannes he was choirmaster in Salzburg from 1606 to 1608, after which he rejoined the imperial chapel until 30 September 1617. It seems likely he died in Bohemia late in 1619. He published his five-voice Liber primus motectorum in Prague in 1595, and one motet and two odes by him appeared in collections ($1604^7$, $1610^{18}$; $1604^7$ is ed. in RRMR, xxiv–xxv, 1977).

(2) Lambert [Lampertus] de Sayve (b ? nr Liège, 1548/49; d Linz, 16–28 Feb 1614). Composer and singer, second son of Raskin de Seave, and the most important member of the family. Fétis confused him with Lambert de Sainne. He entered the imperial chapel in Vienna as a choirboy in 1562, and an early indication of his talents was the publication of three motets in books 3 and 4 of Giovannelli's Novi atque catholici thesauri musici ($1568^{4-5}$). Emperor Maximilian II made him singing master of Melk Abbey, Lower Austria, in 1569. In 1570–71 he accompanied the Archduchess Anna-Maria on her journey to Spain for her marriage to Philip II; after the marriage he returned to Melk. By February 1577 and until the end of December 1582 he was tutor to the choirboys in the chapel of Archduke Karl in Graz, and in 1583 he became choirmaster in the chapel of Archduke Matthias of Austria (the brother of Emperor Rudolf II). In 1584 he was joined in Vienna by his nephew Carl and possibly Libert, sons of (1) Mathias de Sayve (i); (4) Arnold de Sayve may have joined him later. When Matthias succeeded his brother as emperor in 1612 he took his chapel musicians with him, and Lambert de Sayve became master of the imperial chapel.

Sayve's Sacrae symphoniae (1612) was dedicated to the emperor on his coronation. It is an extensive collection of liturgically ordered motets and contains music written over many years. The contents range from traditional four-part settings in the manner of his teacher Monte, to 8-, 12- and 16-part polychoral works (with instruments) in the Venetian style. The publication includes a portrait of the composer, then aged 63. The fluency and resourcefulness shown in the motets are equally evident in the less ambitious but more consistently successful Teutsche Liedlein, reminiscent of Regnart (two of whose lieder are in the same publication). In these short, attractive, strophic songs – canzonets in style and structure, scored for higher and middle-range voices only – Sayve devised points and textures of surprising variety and interest, coupled with compelling if straightforward harmonies. Praetorius, who referred to de Sayve with glowing enthusiasm in his Syntagma musicum (Wolfenbüttel, 1614–18), thought well enough of these lieder to reissue the complete set at Wolfenbüttel in 1611.

(3) Erasme [Raso] de Sayve (*b c*1563; d 1631 or 1632). Singer and composer, son of (1) Mathias de Sayve (i). From 1573 to 1577 he was duodenus in the collegiate church of St Martin-en-Mont, Liège, and on 22 February 1587 the chapter of St Martin appointed 'Raso de Sayve, filius succentoris' to the altar of St John the Baptist, an appointment usually reserved for young musicians. Some time after this Erasme took leave of absence from Liège to study in Vienna; on 29 January 1588 this leave was extended. He entered the service of Archduke Matthias, and on 1 September 1613 was appointed deputy choirmaster in the imperial chapel, thus becoming for a while assistant to his uncle, (2) Lambert de Sayve. Erasme de Sayve apparently left this post in 1617 to become Burggraf at the imperial court of Matthias and Ferdinand II; he certainly held that position in October 1631. In December 1632 his widow was awarded an annual pension of 100 thalers.

(4) Arnold de Sayve (*b c*1574; d 15 July 1618). Singer, son of (1) Mathias de Sayve (i). He entered the choir of St Martin-en-Mont, Liège, on 6 July 1584. According to Bragard he served for the last time as a boy chorister in the imperial chapel at Vienna in 1592; he may then have followed his brother Carl and possibly Libert, who joined their uncle (2) Lambert de Sayve in Vienna in 1584. On 1 February 1602 he was re-engaged as an alto, and he remained in the choir until 1617.

(5) Mathias de Sayve (ii) (*b c*1576–80; *d c*1616). Singer and ?composer. He was a chorister in the imperial chapel, Vienna, from 1590 to 1595, and a tenor in the choir from 1 August 1603 to 1616. Eitner and Vannes referred to masses by him for six and nine voices in Breslau (now Wrocław), but these may be by (2) Lambert de Sayve.

Saz [sāz]. Persian and Turkish term meaning 'musical instrument'. This term is most widely applied to long-necked fretted lutes found in the Caucasus, Turkey, south-eastern Europe and neighbouring areas including northern Syria and northern Iran. It is often used loosely, sometimes differentiating a different type of long-necked lute, or as an alternative appellation for ṭanbūr, bağlama, buzuq or chogur. (For the Turkish saz see BAĞLAMA. For a broad survey of related types see ṬANBŪR.)

In the past the term 'saz' was applied to many types of musical instrument. In Iran, Afghanistan and neighbouring areas it is commonly applied to the sornā (shawm) which is always played with a drum (dohōl), especially in a composite word for this duo: sāzdohōl. In Afghanistan 'saz' is also used for the portable harmonium.

The Caucasian long-necked lute known as saz has a pear-shaped resonator carved from a single piece of wood, or fitted together from wooden staves. It has a thin wooden soundboard with small soundholes. Openings are also carved in the sides of the body. The neck is straight with 10 to 14 gut frets arranged to produce an incomplete chromatic scale. It ends in a pegbox holding wooden pegs. The instrument is often ornamented with mother-of-pearl. Most instruments have eight to ten metal strings in double or triple courses. A typical Azerbaijani tuning is d'/d'/d'–g/g–c'/c'/c'. The first two courses are stopped, the third is played open, providing a drone.

In Azerbaijan the saz is made in several sizes: the large saz is 120 to 150 cm long; the length of the medium saz is 80 to 100 cm and the small saz (called khyrda saza or goltukh saza) is 50 to 70 cm long. Large instruments have a leather strap worn over the shoulder during performance. The saz is held against the upper chest, the neck of the instrument thrust upwards (see AZERBAIJAN, fig.2). It is played with a plectrum sounding all the strings simultaneously. Played by professionals and amateurs, the Caucasian saz is primarily the instrument of the ashug (traditional poet-musicians); its repertory contains heroic historical songs, epics, romantic stories and humorous, satirical, and love songs. In the Caucasus large ashug ensembles, with 15 to 20 players, are known; the saz is also used in various ensembles of folk instruments.

The Armenian saz is similar in function and performance to that of Azerbaijan. It is from 55 to 110 cm long, with metal strings arranged in three or four double or triple courses. The first course is used for the melody, the middle course or courses for a sustained drone, and the last performs a supplementary role, harmonic and partly melodic.

The saz as used in urban Muslim traditions of Bosnia-Hercegovina can have up to 18 or 19 movable or fixed frets, and the Albanian saze has up to 20. It is made by craftsmen in various sizes, from 60 to 118 cm in length; smaller models have fewer frets and strings. It has seven to nine metal strings tuned in three courses: f'/f'/f'–c'–g'/g'/g'/g'. The strings are plucked with a plectrum of cherry-tree bark. In nortern Albania the saze is a basic member of urban ensembles, hence their names: sazet or sazexhijtë.

Sbarra, Francesco (b Lucca, 19 Feb 1611; d Vienna, 20 March 1668). Italian poet and librettist partly resident in Austria. His family belonged to the aristocracy of Lucca, and its head held the title of Marquis of Lombrici (Leombria), which appears on the printed libretto to Venere cacciatrice (Innsbruck, 1659; music by Cesti). From 1633 he was a member of the Accademia degli Oscuri at Lucca and later of the Accademia degli Accesi, for which he directed the opera La Psiche (text by F. di Poggio, music by Tomaso Breni) at the Palazzo dei Borghi in 1645. After the death of his wife in that year he entered the priesthood and was twice elected a canon of Lucca Cathedral. On several occasions from 1636 he composed poetry for musical celebrations of government ceremonies; he also wrote several sets of intermedi during the 1640s.

Sbarra's most original works were a series of musical dramas and intermedi, tragic as well as comic, with moralizing intent and using symbolic figures; these include La verità raminga (1650), La moda (1652), La tirannide dell'Interesse (1653) and La corte (1657). In La tirannide, a five-act 'tragedia politicomorale', Interest kills Intellect, enslaves Desire and with the help of Hypocrisy and Adulation makes himself absolute tyrant of the Isle of Free Will. Although performed only locally, these works saw many editions, were in wide circulation and weathered anti-Seicento Italian literary criticism unusually well. His most performed work, Alessandro vincitor di se stesso (Venice, Teatro SS Giovanni e Paolo, 1651, music by Cesti), owes much to G.A. Cicognini in its verse forms and handling of comedy and even in some details of plot, but has declared allegorical intent as well. The libretto includes a letter to Michel' Angelo Torcigliani, in which Sbarra addresses the issue of verisimilitude in opera and the uses of speech and song.

Sbarra had contacts with the archdukes of Austria from the early 1650s (Alessandro vincitor di se stesso is dedicated to Leopold Wilhelm) and with the court of Ferdinand Karl at Innsbruck by 1654. From 1659 he was in residence there as counsellor and court poet, probably as successor to G.F. Apolloni and possibly through the offices of Cesti. For Innsbruck he produced librettos and eulogistic poetry for music, such as the idyll Il tributo degli elementi for the new sovereign, Siegmund Franz, in 1663. After the extinction of the Tyrolese line in 1665 he obtained a similar position at the Viennese court, where his compositions included texts for sepolcri (e.g. L'inferno deluso nella morte di Gesù Cristo, 1665, music by Bertali), further moralizing entertainments (Le disgrazie d'Amore, 1667, music by Cesti), ballets and the large-scale festive drama Il pomo d'oro (libretto published 1668, music by Cesti), intended for the marriage celebration of Emperor Leopold I.

Scabellum (Lat.; Gk., usually plural, kroupezai or kroupala). Ancient percussion instrument consisting of foot-activated clappers (it is classified as an idiophone). It took the form of a sandal with a thick wooden sole hinged to a similarly shaped block of wood on the ground. To each of the wooden parts hollowed clappers of varying materials were attached.

The Hittite word ḫuḫupal may refer to some such instrument, which was comparatively rare in Greece but became relatively prominent in Rome with the general expansion of instrumental usage there. It found a place in the orgiastic music of Dionysiac festivals, but it was most commonly used by a tibia player to emphasize dance rhythms when accompanying a group of pantomimi, or acting as leader to such a theatrical instrumental ensemble (see also GREECE, §I, 5(i)(b)). This player was called the scabillarius, and the Roman organization of theatrical musicians, the collegium scabillariorum, was named after him. The scabellum appears also with some frequency in Roman representations of cult music (see ROME, fig.4).

Scacarum [scacatorum] (Lat.). See CHEKKER.

Scacchi, Marco (b Gallese, nr Viterbo, *c*1600; d Gallese, 7 Sept 1662). Italian composer and writer on music. He is remembered chiefly for his defence of modern music against the conservative Paul Siefert but deserves to be recognized as a highly original thinker about music.

1. Life. 2. Music. 3. Polemical and theoretical writings.

1. LIFE. Scacchi was a protégé and disciple of Giovanni Francesco Anerio. He went to Warsaw as a violinist about 1621, where he served first as a musician to Prince Władysław then probably as master of the prince's private music. In 1633, after the prince's coronation as Władysław IV, Scacchi became master of the royal chapel. Poor health led him to retire to Gallese in March 1649, but he continued to teach; among his pupils was Angelo Berardi, who cited him extensively and printed two of his works in Documenti armonici (1687).

2. MUSIC. Scacchi composed in all genres of vocal music. Most of his religious music is in what his own theoretical writings called 'stile imbastardito' – a mixed style that he judged admissible in the seconda pratica. It was his duty to provide music for official court occasions, and he must have written numerous polychoral works (there is a reference to one for 16 voices), but only one such work has survived complete, the Missa omnium tonorum. The mass is a rare example of a work incorporating all the modes. Scacchi's concertato religious works frequently use trio texture and solo passages in recitative style (for example in Qui timet Dominum). Venetian influence is discernible in the form of some of these pieces, for example the rondo structure of Laudate pueri Dominum. Among his compositions in the prima pratica are the collection of masses (1633) and the works in the Cribrum musicum.

The only dramatic work to which Scacchi's name can be firmly attached is Il ratto di Helena (1634), but he probably contributed to a number of works staged at the Polish court. Since the music is lost, we can only speculate as to its style. On the basis of Scacchi's theoretical writings and his familiarity with the music of Monteverdi, we may assume that his recitative was less rigorous and more tuneful than that of the early Florentines. Scacchi composed madrigals throughout his career. He probably published three books, though only one survives. The poetic texts of this book are mostly by Guarini, and the madrigals show the influence of Monteverdi's Guarini settings in his fourth and fifth books of madrigals.

3. POLEMICAL AND THEORETICAL WRITINGS. Scacchi believed that each genre demanded a distinct style, with certain standards of compositional technique of its own. It consequently irritated him to find Siefert mixing genres in his Psalmen Davids, nach francösischer Melodey (Danzig, 1640); or at least this gave him a pretext for answering slanderous statements that Siefert had made about Italian music. These were occasioned by a long-standing quarrel in Danzig between Siefert and the elder Kaspar Förster, respectively organist and choirmaster of the Marienkirche. In his Cribrum musicum ad triticum Syferticum ('Musical sieve for the Syfert wheat', 1643) Scacchi enumerated and discussed 151 errors that he accused Siefert of committing in his psalms, among them excursions from the mode, parallel 5ths and octaves, incorrect fugal answers and misuse of the thoroughbass. He appended some models of good composition in the various genres: several mass movements, two continuo madrigals for four voices, a continuo motet for five voices, a four-part motet and a duet in 'mixed recitative style', all of which he wrote himself, and 50 learned pieces, mostly canons, by Polish, Italian and other composers resident in Poland, under the rubric Xenia apollinea ('Apollonian gifts').

Siefert replied with Anticribratio musica ad avenam Schachianam hoc est, Ocularis demonstratio crassisssimorum [sic] errorum, quos Marchus Schachius quem Cribrum musicum ad triticum Syferticum baptizavit, passim in eo commisit (Danzig, 1645). He pleaded that he followed the 'Belgian' and not the 'Italian' school, and he cited his teacher Sweelinck and Giovanni Valentini (who worked in Poland and Vienna) as precedents for some of the practices that Scacchi had criticized. He responded to Scacchi's critique point by point and then went on to enumerate the faults he purported to find in Scacchi's model compositions and offered one of his own canons to add to the Xenia apollinea.

Rather than respond directly in print, Scacchi collected letters supporting him from eminent composers, the last dated 4 January 1649, and had them printed in a volume entitled Judicium Cribri musici. They were written by Schütz, Stobaeus, Starck, Michael, Ducius, Cracowitta, Werner, Triben, Kimkovius and Profe. Schütz, who contributed two letters (on 7 September 1646 and in 1648; nos.59 and 69 in Müller von Asow), diplomatically declined to side with either party in the dispute, praising both of them and urging Scacchi to complete the treatise on counterpoint that he had promised, 'for it would certainly greatly profit our German nation first of all and would bring immortal fame to himself and glory to his name'. Without naming Scacchi, Schütz apparently again referred to this same treatise in the preface to his Geistliche Chor-Music (1648), a reference that was once thought to apply to Christoph Bernhard. Schütz there counselled musicians to find the right road to counterpoint by studying the excellent works of many composers, both Italians and others, in the old and concertato styles, and he added (Neue Ausgabe sämtlicher Werke, v, p.vii), 'In this regard I still entertain the hope, indeed I have already reports, that a musician well known to me, highly accomplished in both theory and practice, will soon bring to light an entire treatise. This could be very salutary and profitable, especially for us Germans'. Scacchi did state in his Lettera per maggiore informatione that he would produce a brief counterpoint treatise, but there is only a long manuscript letter to Christoph Werner and the Breve discorso sopra la musica moderna (1649).

The Breve discorso is a plea for the acceptance of a multiplicity of styles. It was written partly to counter the slurs of Siefert (who, however, is not named) against the modern Italian style of church music and partly to shrug off the support of Romano Micheli, whom Scacchi scorned as a decadent contriver of puzzle canons. He admitted that there were fine composers who followed 'the very learned Palestrina', but he saw no reason why everyone should be reduced to the poverty of one style. Every liberal art feeds upon innovation, and so should music. Whereas the older composers built the first practice on the principle 'ut harmonia sit domina orationis', the moderns build on the second practice, 'ut oratio sit domina harmoniae' (the phrases are the famous ones of G.C. Monteverdi in the Latin of Cribrum musicum).

In the letter to Werner, Scacchi made a comprehensive classification of musical styles, all of which he felt were accessible to, and viable for, composers of the time, but for different purposes. There were three main classes: church (ecclesiasticus), chamber (cubicularis) and scenic or theatrical (scenicus seu theatralis). He divided the church style into four types: masses, motets and other vocal pieces without organ for four to eight voices; the same with organ or with several choruses; similar vocal music in concerto, that is with instruments; and motets or concerti in the modern style, that is (as explained in Breve discorso) in stile misto or recitativo imbastardito ('hybrid recitative'), in which the recitative is interrupted by ornate and melodious passages or sacred songs in aria style. The chamber style had three components: madrigals without instruments (da tavolino), vocal pieces with continuo, and vocal pieces with instruments such as violins, violas 'majores', theorbos, lutes and recorders. The theatrical style is a single style of 'speech perfected by song, or song by speech'. The letter also contains valuable suggestions about writing in the polychoral and concerted sacred styles.

Scacchi's classification of styles was further developed by Bernhard in his Tractatus compositionis augmentatus and by Berardi in Ragionamenti musicali (1681) and Miscellanea musicale (1689); it is also the basis of the divisions of musical genres given by Fux in Gradus ad Parnassum (1725) and by Mattheson in Der vollkommene Capellmeister (1739).

Scaccia, Angelo Maria (b Milan, *c*1690; d Milan, 29 Sept 1761). Italian violinist and composer. As a youth he was called 'Scaccino' to distinguish him from his violinist father Carlo Federico Scaccia. He was an occasional player in the Milanese ducal theatre and chapel by 1711. On 31 March 1719 he became a supernumerary member of the ducal orchestra, taking his father's regular position on 16 January 1751. For his outstanding ability he was the first to receive the ducal patente di violinista.

Scaccia's concertos belong to the tradition of Vivaldi but the lighter texture, delicate ornamentation, more frequent alternation of solo and tutti, broader harmonic plateaux and influence of symphonic form mark them as later productions. On 31 March 1744 St Dutés in Paris received a general privilege to print 12 overtures by Scaccia, but there appears to be no trace of these pieces.

Scalabrini, Paolo (b 1713; d Lucca, 1803 or 28 Feb 1806). Italian composer. He was music director for the Mingotti opera company from 1742 at the latest, when it was at Graz. He travelled with it through Germany and parts of the Austrian empire, composing and arranging many operas and going in 1747 to Copenhagen, where the company performed every year until 1756. In 1748 he married the soprano Grazia Mellini. The same year J.A. Scheibe was dismissed as court maestro di cappella in Copenhagen and Scalabrini given his place, which he held until 1753; he was replaced by Sarti. Scalabrini remained there, composing several intermezzos and Danish Singspiele. He then travelled for some years, but returned to Copenhagen in 1768 as music director of an opera company he had assembled in Italy. When Sarti left in 1775, Scalabrini again became court maestro di cappella, until, after the death of his first wife in 1781, he returned finally to Italy. According to Schmidl he died on 28 February 1806.

In 1868 she sang Azucena in Il trovatore at Covent Garden, where she returned virtually every year until 1889; she was also active in St Petersburg from 1872 to 1881 and in 1889–90. Her repertory included many travesty roles as well as Maddalena (Rigoletto), Amneris (Aida), Léonore (La favorite), Fidès (Le prophète) and Ortrud (Lohengrin). In 1882 she appeared at Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro and at New York, where she made her début at the Academy of Music as Arsaces (Semiramide). At the opening night of the Metropolitan (22 October 1883) she sang Siébel in Faust; after singing Cenerentola at Florence (1886) and Vanya in the first London performance of Glinka's A Life for the Tsar at Covent Garden (1887), she returned to New York as Emilia in the first American performance of Verdi's Otello at the Academy of Music (1888). During her last seasons at the Metropolitan she sang Gluck's Orfeo (1893), Beppe in L'amico Fritz (1894) and Mistress Quickly in the American première of Falstaff (1895). She retired in 1896. Her voice was voluminous but very flexible, with a wide range.

Scalcotas, Nikolaos. See SKALKOTTAS, NIKOLAOS.

Scale (Fr. gamme; Ger. Tonleiter; It. gamma). A sequence of notes in ascending or descending order of pitch. As a musicological concept, a scale is a sequence long enough to define unambiguously a mode, tonality, or some special linear construction, and that begins and ends (where appropriate) on the fundamental note of the tonality or mode; a scale, therefore, is usually thought of as having the compass of one or more octaves. The following discussion is limited to the scales of European musical theory.

Seven-note scales lying within the octave, which are also known as 'heptachords', contain one representative of each letter name (A–B–C–D–E–F–G), any of which may be inflected by an accidental. A scale is DIATONIC if the sequence of notes is based on a particular species of octave consisting of five tones (t) and two semitones (s). The white notes of the piano perhaps offer the simplest illustration of diatonic scales; see Table 1. The scales on D, E, F and G as given are the most common of the four authentic church modes (see MODE). The Locrian or HYPERAEOLIAN scale, given on B in Table 1, is almost never used, since the unstable interval of a tritone occurs between the two most important degrees, the first and fifth. The remaining scales are those of the major and minor mode without any key signature.

Transposition, the raising or lowering of every note by the same interval, affects the name of a diatonic scale only insofar as it changes its starting note. For instance, if the notes in Table 1 were transposed a semitone up, they would yield scales in D♭ major (D♭–E♭–F–G♭–A♭–B♭–C–D♭), E♭ Dorian (E♭–F–G♭–A♭–B♭–C–D♭–E♭), F Phrygian and so on.

There are three ways of conceiving the minor scale in tonal theory. The natural minor (ex.1) consists simply of the ascending or descending sequence of tones and semitones given under the scale from A to A in Table 1. The melodic minor (ex.2) has raised sixth and seventh degrees ascending, but is the same as the natural minor descending.

Ex.2 Melodic minor scale

This scale can be abstracted from the characteristic movement of minor key melodies where the raised seventh acts as a leading note in the ascending direction (the sixth is raised to avoid an augmented interval between the sixth and seventh degrees). The harmonic minor scale has a raised seventh in both directions, but the sixth is left unaltered. In this way it becomes the product of the three primary harmonic functions, being generated from the triads of the tonic, subdominant, and dominant (with raised third), as illustrated in ex.3.

Ex.3 Harmonic minor scale

The chromatic scale proceeds entirely by semitones. It can be spelt either in such a way that every note makes a diatonic interval with the starting note (minor 2nd, major 2nd, minor 3rd etc.), as in ex.4*a*, or so that a minimum number of accidentals is used, as in ex.4*b*. A 'gapped scale' contains intervals of a minor 3rd or more, and is so called because it appears to be incomplete in comparison with heptatonic scales; the most widely used example is the PENTATONIC scale. In the WHOLE-TONE SCALE, which consists of only six notes, one letter name is missing; however, this scale is not truly gapped, because if enharmonic re-spelling is allowed there is no interval which cannot be written as a 2nd (C–D–E–F♯–G♯–A♯–C contains the diminished 3rd A♯–C, but C–D–E–F♯–G♯–B♭–C replaces this with the major 2nd B♭–C). The whole-tone scale can only be transposed by a semitone once without reproducing the original set of notes; it is therefore a MODE OF LIMITED TRANSPOSITION. Another such mode is the OCTATONIC scale, which includes eight notes in a pattern of alternating semitones and tones; in this scale at least one letter name is duplicated (e.g. C–D♭–E♭–E♮–F♯–G–A–B♭–C).

A scale which, when its letter names are arranged in alphabetical order, contains at least one descending interval, is termed 're-entrant' (e.g. A–B♯–C♭–D–E–F–G).

Scaletta, Orazio (b Crema, province of Cremona, *c*1550; d Padua, 1630). Italian composer. According to his Primo libro de' madrigali of 1585, he was then a maestro di cappella in Milan. The dedication of the Vilanelle alla romana (1590) suggests that he was then living in Venice, and had been for some time, since it acknowledges the influence of Giovanni Gabrieli, 'honoratissimo nella nostra professione'. In the same year he was maestro at Lodi, and in 1595 was, according to the dedication of the Effetti d'amore, living in Bergamo. Between 1601 and 1609 he was maestro di cappella at Crema, and subsequently maestro at the Chiesa Maggiore, Salò, until 1611. By 1615 he had returned to Bergamo, where he was maestro di cappella at S Maria Maggiore. Although the Duke of Mantua ordered a gold coin to be minted in Scaletta's honour during his time at Crema, and Louis XIII later presented him with a gold crown in Paris and granted him permission to reproduce the fleur de lys in his publications, his position at Bergamo does not seem to have been particularly important. Indeed, by 1617 the choir was at a low point with just three altos, two tenors and two basses, and is reported as extremely ill-disciplined, a situation that was also characteristic of his period at Salò. By 1620 he had been replaced by Cavaccio. Towards the end of his life Scaletta may have been at the basilica of S Antonio in Padua, where he apparently died of the plague.

Scaletta is principally known as the author of two treatises, of which the more popular, Scala di musica, was reprinted 14 times, in a variety of formats, up to 1647, appearing in a revised version as late as 1685. In both books he dealt with simple didactic matters in a straightforward manner. According to Lederer they demonstrate freedom from Zarlino's strict teachings (unusual for their early dates), and by concentrating on practical issues they suggest that theorists had begun to appreciate the developing seconda pratica.

IAIN FENLON

Scaletti, Carla (b Ithaca, NY, 28 April 1956). American composer and inventor. She studied composition with Martirano, Brün, John Melby and Scott Wyatt at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign (DMA 1984); she also took the degree of Master of Computer Science at Illinois (1988) and the MM at Texas Tech University (1979). An accomplished performer, she was principal harpist of the Lubbock SO (1978–79) and the New Mexico SO (1975–77). She was appointed to the teaching staff at Illinois in 1982. In collaboration with Kurt Hebel, Scaletti developed the Kyma Sound System, a computer-based environment for musical experimentation and creation. Indeed, she is the founder and president of the Symbolic Sound Corporation, the manufacturer and distributor of the Kyma system. The recipient of several awards, the system features almost exclusively in her later works, the interaction between performer, composer and machine remaining a primary motivation. In 1995 Scaletti received an International Computer Music Association award for her inter-active online installation Public Organ. She has composed several pieces for tape alone as

Scaling (Fr. diapason; Ger. Mensur). In organ pipes, the relationship between the length and diameter of a given pipe, and its progression throughout the compass of a rank of pipes. Since the 18th century, several attempts have been made to relate pipe scaling to a 'norm'. Scale affects tonal quality: a pipe that is fairly wide in proportion to its length will have a foundational, fluty tone; one that is fairly narrow will have a thin, stringy tone. From the 15th century to the present day, numerous concepts of pipe-scaling have been propounded by theoreticians, although practical organ builders tend to employ a more empirical approach based on what ratios they have found will provide the desired consistency of timbre throughout the range of a given stop.

In string keyboard instruments, the term refers to the sounding length of the strings in relation to their pitch. Given constant tension and diameter, a string sounding an octave below another will be twice its length, but for practibility the scaling is normally shortened in the bass, as even in a harpsichord with generally short scaling (25 cm for c″ instead of 35 cm) the maintenance of 'just' scaling in the bass would oblige the sounding length of the C-string to exceed two metres. Most early clavichords, harpsichords and pianos retain a 'just' scaling for at least the upper half of their compass, and begin to shorten the scaling in the tenor range, the reduction in relative string length being compensated for by increases in diameter and, in many instances, by the use of a heavier substance for the bass strings. In the modern piano the scaling is gradually shortened throughout the range from treble to bass, one aim of this 'tapered' scaling being to achieve a smooth gradation of string tension and timbre throughout the instrument's compass.

Scalzi, Carlo [Cichion] (b Voghera, Lombardy; fl 1718–39). Italian soprano castrato. He is first heard of in Rome in 1718–19, singing in three operas (two by Alessandro Scarlatti), twice playing female roles. He reappeared in Rome in 1722, 1728–9, 1731–2 and 1739 (his last known performance). From 1719 to 1722 he was in Venice, in five operas by Antonio Pollarolo, Giovanni Porta and Orlandini, returning in 1724–5 in operas by Vinci and others, and in 1737–8 in four operas, including Porpora's Rosbale and Hasse's Alessandro nell'Indie. He appeared in Reggio nell'Emilia and Modena in 1720, Milan in 1720, 1722–4, 1726, 1728 and 1730, Bologna and Treviso in 1721, Genoa in 1722–4 and 1733, Florence in 1723 and 1729, Munich in 1724, Parma in 1725, Naples in 1726–7 (Vinci's Ernelinda, Hasse's Sesostrate and other operas), 1730 (when he created the title role in Hasse's Ezio) and 1731, and Piacenza in 1733. Handel engaged him for the London season of 1733–4; he made his début in the pasticcio Semiramide riconosciuta, and subsequently sang in revivals of Ottone (Adalberto), Sosarme (Argone) and Il pastor fido (1734, Silvio) and in the first production of Arianna in Creta (Alcestes, strictly Handel's only new part for him). On retiring from the stage he entered the Congregazione dell'Oratorio, Genoa. The numerous transpositions and alterations made by Handel give us a clear idea of Scalzi's voice, a high soprano with a compass from c' to b♭''. He made little impression in London but was placed in the front rank on the Continent. Metastasio bracketed him with Farinelli as 'incomparable'. (SartoriL)

Scandello [Scandelli], Antonio [Scandellus, Antonius] (b Bergamo, 17 Jan 1517; d Dresden, 18 Jan 1580). Italian composer and instrumentalist, active in Germany. His rise to the position of Kapellmeister at the electoral court in Dresden made him one of the most important musicians in Germany during the second half of the 16th century. His family was one of several that supplied the city of Bergamo with trumpeters, and Antonio and his brother Angelo followed their father, Hieronimus, in this career. Antonio was first employed as a trumpeter in the city in 1530, and he subsequently served as a member of the town piffari. Surviving documents identify him also as a cornettist and perhaps also a trombonist. In 1547 he left Bergamo with Cerbonio and Matthias Besutio, for the court of Cardinal Madruzzi in Trent. During a visit to Trent in early 1549, Elector Moritz of Saxony hired Madruzzi's instrumentalists, following the trend of including Italian instrumentalists among court retinues, and by mid-April of that year Antonio and five other Italians were in Dresden; his brother Angelo joined them two years later.

Scandello's earliest compositions date from the 1550s. His most notable early work, the Missa sex vocum super epitaphium Mauritii, was dedicated to his patron, who had died in battle in 1553. Scandello's first extant published works comprise three motets and a Magnificat, which were published in Nuremberg (RISM $1564^{1-2}$). His early concentration on Latin works is interesting – these settings are complex and ornate, revealing a strong familiarity with the Flemish contrapuntal style. There is, however, no known evidence that Scandello received formal training in vocal techniques in Bergamo (see Towne); that he was working as an instrumentalist by the age of 13 suggests that he would not have studied vocal composition until later. During his years as an instrumentalist in Bergamo he undoubtedly worked with Gasparo Alberti, and private study in composition with the Flemish composer is a distinct possibility. Reinhard Kade proposed another scenario – that Scandello received instruction from his Kapellmeister, Johann Walter (i) and Matthaeus Le Maistre.

The Flemish-born Le Maistre, who may previously have served in the Bavarian court chapel in Munich, was appointed Hofkapellmeister in Dresden in 1554, following Walter's retirement. As Le Maistre's health began to fail, Scandello was groomed to succeed him, and in 1566 was appointed to the newly created post of Vice-Kapellmeister: he had demonstrated his strong personal commitment to the court by obtaining Dresden citizenship and converting to Lutheranism, and after so many years of service as instrumentalist and composer his abilities were well known. By February 1568 he was handling all the duties of a Kapellmeister, and later that year was appointed to the post; he served in that capacity until his death.

His first published collection, a book of canzoni napolitane printed in 1566, was followed in 1568 by a set of lieder. His period as Hofkapellmeister was a time of considerable compositional output, with four printed collections being released between 1570 and 1577. His extant works include at least eight masses, about a dozen Latin motets; three printed collections of sacred and secular lieder, a setting of the St John Passion and an Easter historia; and two collections of canzoni. No extant instrumental music has been attributed to him.

Stylistically, Scandello's writing reveals a command of traditional contrapuntal techniques as well as a familiarity with emerging trends. He was generally conservative in his approach to dissonance. His use of chromaticism is on the whole relatively infrequent, yet its application is effective and enhances the emotional aspects of the text, as exemplified in his historia, Gaudii paschalis Jesu Christi. His German songs range from traditional Tenorlieder to cantional, chordal and imitative settings. His three polychoral works (a lied, a motet and a Magnificat), reveal a relatively early awareness of the style.

During his lifetime two of his collections were reissued twice: the Primo libro delle canzone napolitane (1566) in 1572 and 1583, and the Nawe und lustige weltliche deudsche Liedlein (1570) in 1578 and 1579. His compositions also appear in 19 printed anthologies and in numerous manuscripts. In addition, his historia, composed in about 1573, was well known: it exercised a considerable influence on Schütz, and was published in 1612 and again in 1621, some 40 years after Scandello's death. His St John Passion, composed in 1561, was also first printed in 1621.

His death in January 1580 seems to have been rather sudden, judging by the process that the Dresden court followed in searching for his successor. Georg Forster, a singer who had been employed by the court since 1575, was named interim Kapellmeister, but after the post had been declined by both Lassus and Jacob Regnart, it was awarded to another Italian, Giovanni Battista Pinello di Ghirardi. Scandello's son August (b 1570) continued the family tradition, serving in the Dresden and Wolfenbüttel chapels until his death in 1609.

Scandicus (from Lat. scandere: 'to ascend'). In Western chant notations a neume signifying three notes in ascending order. (For illustration see NOTATION, Table 1; see also M. Huglo: 'Les noms des neumes et leur origine', EG, i, 1954, 53–67.)

Scandiuzzi, Roberto (b Treviso, 14 July 1958). Italian bass. He studied at the conservatory in Treviso and made his début at La Scala in 1982 as Bartolo (Le nozze di Figaro) with Muti. Thereafter he appeared regularly throughout Italy. He first appeared at Covent Garden in 1985 as Raimondo (Lucia di Lammermoor), followed by a superb Fiesco, then equally imposing portrayals of Banquo and King Philip II. In 1992 he made his US operatic début at San Francisco as Padre Guardiano, and his Vienna Staatsoper début in the same role. He first sang at the Metropolitan in 1995 as Fiesco. His other roles include Don Giovanni, Rodolfo (La sonnambula), Oroveso, Rossini's Moses, Henry VIII (Anna Bolena), Silva (Ernani), Zaccaria (Nabucco), Attila, Colline, Gremin, Timur and both Gounod's and Boito's Mephistopheles. His concert repertory includes Rossini's Stabat mater and Verdi's Requiem (with which he made his US début in 1991), both of which he has recorded. His large, sonorous, typically Italianate bass is supported by his equally impressive presence. Notable among his opera recordings are Don Carlos and Simon Boccanegra.

ALAN BLYTH

Scapigliatura (It.: 'bohemianism'). A term used to identify a period (1860–80) of renewal in Italian culture. As a literary trend, it opened the way to VERISMO while anticipating features of the fin-de-siècle decadent movement. The terms scapigliatura and scapigliati ('dishevelled young men', with reference to Murger's Scènes de la vie de bohème) were used in the novel La scapigliatura e il 6 febbraio (Milan, 1862) by Cletto Arrighi.

Anti-bourgeois selfconsciousness and disorderly lifestyle characterized a group of artists and intellectuals in Milan in the 1860s, the scapigliati. The poets Emilio Praga (1839–75) and Arrigo Boito (1842–1918) were the central figures, along with the musician Franco Faccio (1840–91). Scapigliatura was a free brotherhood of dissatisfied, high-minded young men with a strong commitment towards a rejuvenation of Italian culture and the promotion of a close relationship between poetry and its 'sister arts', music and painting. The scapigliati exhibited a taste for morbid and macabre subjects and an acute perception of evil; linguistic and metrical experimentation was a constant feature.

In music, scapigliatura is relevant for its influence on the language of librettos and for the critical writings in Milanese periodicals. Only three operas were produced by the scapigliati: Faccio's I profughi fiamminghi (1863) to a libretto by Praga, Amleto (1865) by Faccio and Boito, and Boito's emblematic Mefistofele (1868).

MATTEO SANSONE/R

Scapitta [Scapita], Vincenzo (b Valenza del Po; d Vienna, 1 Aug 1656). Italian composer. From 1621 to 1633 he was chaplain and tenor at the court of Archduke Leopold V of the Tyrol at Innsbruck. In 1633 Leopold's wife recommended him to Cardinal Ernst von Harrach in Prague, who then apparently arranged for him to enter the service of Cardinal Franz Dietrichstein, Bishop of Olomouc and governor of Moravia. However, he died in 1636, whereupon Scapitta moved to Warsaw, where he became chaplain and tenor at the court of King Władisław IV and in 1645 was given permission to found a minorite friary, of which he became prior. He also acted as Provincial for the order in Transylvania and as its Commissioner for Poland and Russia. The Swedish invasion of Poland in 1655 drove him out of Warsaw, via Lwów (now L'viv) to Vienna, where he died in the minorite friary. The friary's necrology describes him as 'Capellae Magister' at the Polish court, but this office was held by Marco Scacchi until 1649 and then by Bartłomiej Pękiel.

Two printed volumes of music by Scapitta survive. His Vaghi fiori di Maria Vergine . . . con le Litaniae . . . e un 'Laudate Dominum, omnes gentes', for two to four voices, op.2 (RISM 1628[5]), contains sacred works in the style of Viadana's Cento concerti ecclesiastici; 18 are by Scapitta and four by other composers, including one by Johann Stadlmayr, Kapellmeister at the court at Innsbruck. Scapitta's Missae op.3 (Venice, 1629) contains two five-part masses with instruments, 'La Scarmigliona' and 'Altro non è il mio cor', and two eight-part masses, 'La lottiera' and 'Tota pulchra es'. Since he was praised in Scacchi's Cribrum musicum (Venice, 1643) as a leading musician at the Polish court, he may also have made his mark as a composer in Poland, but the only known pieces of his from this period are the two canons published in Scacchi's collection. His lost op.1 may have been published in Augsburg in 1623, and Musica di camera (Venice, 1630) is mentioned in J.G. Walther's Musicalisches Lexicon (1732).

Scarabelli [Scarabeus], Damiano (b Bologna; d ?Milan, ?1598). Italian composer and priest. He studied in Bologna with Andrea Rota, to whom he expressed his debt in the dedication of the reprint of Rota's Motectorum liber primus (Milan, 1588). He is recorded as vicemaestro in the cathedral chapel in Milan between 28 March 1589 and 19 March 1598, an office which brought him a quarterly salary of 96 lire, rising to 132 lire in 1597. His successor was appointed on 15 September 1598, so Scarabelli may have died in that year. His Magnificat settings show a highly developed contrapuntal technique and expressive language. His only known madrigal, the mildly mannerist Ahi non fia ver, mia Clori, was published in the now incomplete Le Gemme (RISM 1590[13]), a collection of madrigals by Bolognese composers.

PIER PAOLO SCATTOLIN

Scarabelli, Diamante Maria (b Bologna; fl 1692–1718). Italian soprano. She is first heard of at Crema and Lodi in 1692 and then sang regularly in the opera houses of north Italy, especially at Venice (1695, 1703–4, 1707–16), where she sang in at least 23 operas, most of them by C.F. Pollarolo, Lotti and Caldara, but including Handel's Agrippina (1709), in which she played Poppaea. She sang frequently in Bologna (1696–7, 1699, 1700, 1708–9, 1711, 1718), winning a spectacular success in the pasticcio Perseo in 1697. This inspired a volume of encomiastic verse, published at Modena, with the punning title La miniera del 'Diamante'. She also appeared in Turin (1695–6), Mantua (1697, 1703), Parma (1699), Milan (1699, 1713), Reggio nell'Emilia (1700, 1712–14), Pavia (1705), Genoa (1705), Vicenza (1707, 1710, 1715), Ferrara (1712, 1715) and Padua (including Orlandini's Lucio Papirio, 1718). She was in the service of the Duke of Mantua (1697–1708), Cardinal Grimani, Viceroy of Naples (1709) and the Duke of Modena (1715). Scarabelli was one of the most celebrated sopranos of her age; the part of Poppaea requires a flexible virtuoso technique and a compass of c′ to b♭″.

WINTON DEAN

Scaramella, Bernardino (fl 1591). Italian composer. He is known only by his Primo libro de madrigali a cinque voci, published in Venice in 1591. He is identified on the title-page as being from Palena, a town north of Naples. His musical style is typical of his time, involving pairing of voices, melismatic passages in 3rds, alternation of chordal with canonic textures and use of cyclic form.

RUTH T. WATANABE

Scarampella, Giuseppe (b Brescia, 25 Aug 1838; d Varese, 1902). Italian violin maker. His father was Paolo Scarampella, a cabinet maker in Brescia. Giuseppe was apprenticed to Nicolo Bianchi in Genoa; he then lived in Paris but returned to Italy in 1866 to work for Luigi Castellani, whom he eventually succeeded as the curator of the Cherubini Conservatory instrument collection in Florence. Perhaps the responsibilities of this position curtailed his output as an instrument maker; his production seems to have centred mostly on violins, with cellos scarcely seen and violas even more rarely. The violins are patterned after the Stradivari and Guarneri models but they differ in several details, most notably the archings, and therefore cannot be called copies. The few cellos known to exist follow the Stradivari model and are mostly varnished a dark red-brown. His usual varnish was either a nut-brown or luminous yellow-orange, though there is an occasional brilliant red. The craftsmanship is very consistent and well carried out. One of his idiosyncrasies was a preference for rather long soundholes, regardless of the model. He remained active as a violin maker until his death in 1902 (not 1885 as recorded by Lütgendorff). His brother Stefano (b Brescia, 17 March 1843; d Mantua, 1927) also made violins; they are largely modelled on those of Guarneri and, to a lesser extent, Stradivari and Balestrieri. Though somewhat inferior in terms of craftsmanship and quality of materials (which vary greatly from instrument to instrument) to those of his brother, Stefano's instruments have gained a growing reputation for their good robust tone, and there is throughout his work a degree of inspired spontaneity which has been compared to the approach of Guarneri. He was prolific in his output, although many instruments bearing the labels of either of the brothers have been found to be fakes.

JAAK LIIVOJA-LORIUS

Scaramuccia, Filisteo (b Capua; fl *c*1580). Italian composer. His only known work is a book of madrigals for four, five and six voices, published in Venice in 1580. The title-page describes the composer as a member of the order of the Knights of St John of Malta, and the volume is dedicated to Jean l'Evêque de la Cassière, Grand Master of the order from 1572 to 1581. The book reflects the strong influence of the canzonetta, and many of the settings are in a largely homophonic style with vigorous rhythms and contrasting triple-time sections. A typical example is the setting of Ariosto's popular Non rumor di tamburi. The collection opens with a complete setting of Petrarch's sestina A la dolce ombra, a text which had previously appealed to a number of composers, including Animuccia, Berchem and Rore.

IAIN FENLON

Scarani, Giuseppe (fl 1628–42). Italian composer, organist and singer. A monk of the Carmelite order, he was organist at the Carmelite church in Mantua in 1628. In January 1629 he went as a singer to the Basilica of S Marco, Venice. In 1641 he was court organist in Mantua. He composed two volumes of two-part madrigals by 1628, a volume of Sonate concertate for two and three instruments (op.1, 1630), a volume of Concerti ecclesiastici (op.2, 1641) and some motets. The sonatas embrace both church and chamber styles; several employ cantus firmi and no.13 uses retrograde inversion in the opening adagio. In general, Scarani's instrumental works are also notable for their chromatic harmonies and affective, cantabile melodies. Overall, however, they may demonstrate how much more circumscribed the instrumental music of Mantua was in comparison to that of Venice.

ELEANOR SELFRIDGE-FIELD

Scarborough, (Frances) Ethel (b Crouch End, London, 10 Jan 1880; d Graffham, Sussex, 9 Dec 1956). English composer and pianist. She studied harmony with Philipp Scharwenka in Berlin, and at the RAM (1900–03). Her large output of compositions includes orchestral and choral works, piano concertos (she played one on a tour in 1905 and another with the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra in 1908) and a symphony (1909). She also wrote piano music and song cycles, the latter broadcast by her in the 1930s. She conducted her Scherzo at Brighton (1914) and it was subsequently given by Dan Godfrey at Bournemouth (1915). There she also conducted her overture Aspiration (1909, 1910), an orchestral fantasy, Promise (given twice in 1923) and the suite Moods (1925). The last was revived in 1988.

After 1925 she devoted more time to Labour politics, taking part in the Jarrow March, and competing unsuccessfully with Aneurin Bevan for adoption as parliamentary candidate at Ebbw Vale (where she composed songs for the miners). She also wrote songs for BBC Children's Hour.

LEWIS FOREMAN

Scaria, Emil (b Graz, 18 Sept 1838; d Blasewitz, nr Dresden, 22 July 1886). Austrian bass. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory and made his début in 1860 at Budapest as St Bris in Les Huguenots with little success. After further study with Manuel García (ii) in London, he made a second début at Dessau, and in 1863 he was engaged at Leipzig and in 1865 at Dresden. His repertory in these early years included Dulcamara in L'elisir d'amore, Falstaff in Nicolai's Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor and Peter the Great in Lortzing's Zar und Zimmermann. Although his powerful voice had the dark colouring of a true bass, its enormous range allowed him to sing baritone roles with equal success. From May 1873 until his death Scaria was engaged at the Vienna Hofoper. He sang Wotan in the first Berlin Ring cycle, given by Angelo Neumann's company at the Viktoria-theater, in May 1881, and also in the first London cycle at Her Majesty's Theatre, again presented by Neumann, in May 1882. During Act 3 of Die Walküre in London he suffered a breakdown and loss of memory, and, though he got through Siegfried two nights later, his place was taken by Reichmann in the second and third cycles. After a rest, Scaria was able to sing Gurnemanz in the first performance of Parsifal at Bayreuth on 26 July 1882, and to rejoin Neumann's touring Wagner company through Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands and Italy, singing Wotan and Rocco in Fidelio. During 1883 he sang King Mark in Tristan und Isolde at both Berlin and Vienna, and returned to Bayreuth to sing Gurnemanz and to produce Parsifal at the first festival held after Wagner's death. The following year he toured the USA in Wagner concerts with Materna and Winkelmann, and also sang Gurnemanz in the first concert performance of Parsifal in London, at the Royal Albert Hall on 10 November 1884. Early in 1886 he again suffered a mental breakdown and died insane a few months later.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Scarlatti. Italian family of musicians. The name, in various spellings (Scarlata, Sgarlata etc.), was common in Sicily in the early 18th century and there were several Scarlatti families in Rome and north Italy. Little is known about the parents of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti; the earliest known documentary evidence shows that Pietro Scarlata married Eleonora d'Amato in Palermo in 1658 and that their first child, Anna Maria Antonia Diana, was born in 1659 and died in infancy. Of their eight children, five were noted musicians; of Alessandro's ten children two were musicians and another (Flaminia) was a singer in private circles: see family tree, fig.1.

(1) (Pietro) Alessandro (Gaspare) Scarlatti (b Palermo, 2 May 1660; d Naples, 22 Oct 1725). Composer, generally considered the founder of the Neapolitan school of 18th-century opera.

1. Rome. He was the second son of the tenor Pietro Scarlata (the form 'Scarlatti' was used from 1672 onwards) and Eleonora d'Amato, who were both involved in Palermo musical life. It was there that Alessandro began the studies that later facilitated his entry into musical life in Rome. In 1670 the death of Vincenzo Amato, a relation of Eleonora, deprived the family of a powerful supporter, and two years later an appalling famine made them decide to leave, first for Rome and then for Naples. Pietro may already have died when, in June 1672, his wife and some of their children moved to Rome; the rapid completion of Alessandro's studies may be attributed to the protection of Marcantonio Sportonio, Pietro's best man. An old legend has Alessandro a pupil of Carissimi, but Carissimi died in January 1674. In any case, the flourishing musical life of Rome offered the young Scarlatti exceptional opportunities for hearing and performing music. He was able to enter the artistic world at the highest level: after his marriage on 12 April 1678 to the 'puella romana' Antonia Maria Vittoria Anzaloni, the 18-year old Scarlatti lodged in an apartment in the palace of Gian Lorenzo Bernini (who had had a Cosimo Scarlatti in his service since 1660). On 11 January 1679 Filippo Bernini, the great architect's son, stood godfather to Alessandro's first child, Pietro. Other increasingly illustrious godparents succeeded him at the baptismal font in S Andrea delle Fratte, for the young musician's talent had aroused the attention of powerful patrons who must have supported his appointment as maestro di cappella at S Giacomo degli Incurabili (16 December 1678) and have assisted him in his rise to the heights of Roman musical life. The Duke of Paganica commissioned oratorios from him to be sung at SS Crocifisso during Lent; Cardinal Pamphili provided him with his own poetry to set and was possibly responsible for Scarlatti's joining the circle of Queen Christina of Sweden. The success of Gli equivoci nel sembiante, a short comic opera, soon taken up in other cities, marked the beginning of the career of the most important opera composer of the period, and Queen Christina was willing to appoint him her maestro di cappella, partly to protect him from the hostility of the Roman Curia, provoked by the marriage his sister Anna Maria had audaciously contracted with a 'cleric'.

Scarlatti left S Giacomo in November 1682 to become maestro di cappella at S Girolamo della Carità. The six operas performed in Rome between 1679 and 1683 are a sign of his success, but opportunities to compose operas, which Pope Innocent XI viewed with distaste, were a privilege offered only by aristocratic patrons who could defy papal displeasure with private performances. Thus the operas were restricted to a limited circle of aristocratic guests, headed by Queen Christina, who was courted by the more broad-minded cardinals, by aristocrats, such as the Neapolitan Dukes of Maddaloni, and by foreign diplomats appointed to the Roman see. Probably it was the Maddaloni who introduced Scarlatti's gifts to Naples and persuaded the composer to move to a city that offered the best opportunities for him to have his operas performed, with the further prospect of succeeding M.A. Ziani as maestro of the royal chapel. The Viceroy's favour was assured: the Marchese del Carpio had had the opportunity to appreciate Scarlatti's music when he was Spanish ambassador in Rome.

2. NAPLES. Scarlatti's arrival aroused jealousy and resentment in Neapolitan musical circles. His appointment to the royal chapel was taken badly by the elderly Francesco Provenzale, the vice-maestro, who had expected to succeed Ziani. But all that his protests and his resignation, and that of other musicians who supported him, achieved was to leave posts vacant for other Roman musicians – including Francesco Scarlatti – who had already been engaged for the season at the Teatro S Bartolomeo. Again in Naples, Alessandro's success risked being compromised by the behaviour of one of his singer sisters: soon after his appointment, the resentments of the excluded musicians erupted into a scandal: the Viceroy stripped of their duties three functionaries who 'had close, illicit relations with several actresses, one of whom is said to be la Scarlatti, whose brother this lord viceroy made his maestro di cappella in competition with native virtuosos'. Hypocritical morality decreed that the royal chapel musicians could keep their posts but that the singers should be punished; the women chose to retreat to a convent rather than face the threat of exile, knowing that after a short period of penitence and confinement Duchess Maddaloni would be able to persuade the Viceroy to free them.

When this momentary crisis had passed, Scarlatti's work provided Neapolitan opera with the impulse that by 1700 would make it rival Venice as the pre-eminent operatic city. New operas often had their first hearing at the royal palace for particular celebrations and immediately went on to the Teatro S Bartolomeo. Scarlatti was also required to compose sacred works and serenatas for specific occasions, while aristocratic entertainments continued to provide an outlet for the many solo cantatas and chamber duets he had begun composing in Rome. Domenico was the first of five children to be born in Naples, on 26 October 1685. Again in his city of adoption the parish registers reflect his privileged position, in the importance of the godparents; but as his family grew Scarlatti's finances, however large his fees (to his colleagues' envy), became precarious. The result was a permanent state of dissatisfaction and a continual search for extra earnings which robbed him of the time and application to carry out the duties of his important posts. For a further ten ducats per month, the appointment as maestro di cappella at the Conservatory of S Maria di Loreto (1 March 1689) carried with it the daily duty of two hours of teaching, but by the end of April Scarlatti had obtained a month's leave of absence to travel to Rome. He did not bother to tell the Conservatory governors when the month had elapsed, and they dismissed him on 15 July.

The death of Queen Christina had not affected his relations with his other Roman patrons, but the continuing ban on theatres made public performances of operas infrequent. There was some respite when the Venetian Pietro Ottoboni became Pope Alexander VIII (6 October 1689 to 1 February 1691) and distributed ecclesiastical posts and privileges to members of his family, showing special favour to a grand-nephew who, a cardinal and vice-chancellor of the church since he was 22, lavished enormous sums on great displays that frequently involved important commissions. The relationship between this sophisticated cardinal and Scarlatti began during Alexander VIII's brief pontificate. In January 1690 La Statira, a dramma per musica by Scarlatti to a libretto by Ottoboni was performed at the Teatro Tordinona, and in the same year Gli equivoci in amore, or La Rosaura, was performed on the double marriage that joined two of the pope's nephews to the powerful Barberini and Colonna families. But others also turned to Scarlatti, now at the peak of his fame as an opera composer. In October 1688 Ferdinando de' Medici, granprincipe of Tuscany and a noted patron of the arts, had sent him a libretto to be set to music; Scarlatti immediately began work 'with haste', although he was working on 'three other comedies'. The prince's letter describing his enjoyment of Scarlatti's score fired hopes of a permanent post, on a salary sufficiently high to allow him to leave Naples. In the meantime, Francesco Scarlatti's move to Palermo resulted in performances of his brother's music in Sicily; only the earliest librettos name the composer, who in Pompeo (1690) flaunts the title 'Maestro di cappella della Reale di Napoli' while in the frontispiece of L'Abramo (1691) he recalls that he is 'from Palermo'. For reasons that are unclear, Scarlatti's increasingly famous name does not appear on the librettos of certain works that can reasonably be attributed to him; in one case – Scipione nelle Spagne, performed in 1721 – he is described as 'the most noble swan of the Oreto', a Baroque allusion to the stream running round Palermo.

Ferdinando de' Medici's patronage led to many performances in Tuscany of operas or oratorios by Scarlatti already given in Naples or Rome; such unambiguous signs that his music was appreciated, together with other Roman patrons' continuing demonstrations of their regard, made him feel increasingly ill-disposed towards Naples, where he had constant problems over the late payment of the money due to him and had to beg for the payment of his hard-earned wages, invoking the 'pressing urgent needs of his own numerous family'.

That family partook of his musical talent. Pietro began an unremarkable career as a second-rate composer, but the memory of the trouble caused by Alessandro's sisters must still have rankled and he would not allow his daughters to go on to the stage, although they were skilled enough as singers to appear in private entertainments or exclusive performances for leading patrons. From 1700 onwards there was a possibility of Flaminia Scarlatti's entering the Medici service. At precisely that time it became clear that Domenico's musical talent was developing. Alessandro now had a new reason for leaving Naples: Domenico could succeed him. This was not before the family had undertaken a long journey to Rome and Florence, essentially in search of new appointments but also intended to astound powerful patrons with his daughters' abilities as singers and with Domenico's prodigious gifts.

With the death of King Carlos II, the War of the Spanish Succession broke out. Italian territories generally favoured Philippe, Duke of Anjou, as opposed to the Habsburg Archduke Karl. To allow the Scarlattis to undertake their planned journey the viceroy, Medinaceli, had allowed him ten months' leave of absence, but this was revoked when it was learnt that the new king, Philip V, was soon to visit Naples. Corelli was called from Rome to add to the splendour of the music, but Philip did not enjoy Corelli's playing. The leading role was taken by Scarlatti, with a 'bellissima serenata' (Clori, Dorino e Amore) followed by a firework display and an opera (Tiberio Imperatore d'Oriente), performed at the royal palace so that the king, at risk from attempts on his life by Austrian assassins, 'could hear it in private'.

After Philip had left, the new viceroy restored Scarlatti's leave of absence, but reduced it to four months. Letters from G.B. Salomoni, the grand-ducal envoy to Naples, provide the background for the journey, which was basically unsuccessful: indiscreetly, Scarlatti took with him 'half his household, as if he were visiting his closest relation', arrived in Florence three months before the performance of the opera he had been commissioned to write, Il Flavio Cuniberto, and lingered in the city more than a month after its performance. His letter of thanks, sent from Rome on 24 November, contains professions 'of the debt of most obedient servants' on behalf of his entire family. It was more than Ferdinando desired from Scarlatti and his reply pointedly ignores the renewed offers and requests, which must have been made verbally and explicitly during Scarlatti's months in Florence.

While Alessandro continued to delay his return to Naples by stopping in Rome in search of new posts, Domenico returned punctually and was well received. Alessandro returned at the end of December 1702, revealing his intention to move to Rome, where he mistakenly thought he had found 'a suitable niche'. Following instructions, Salomoni had discouraged Scarlatti from repeating in Rome the disasters of his visit to Florence. When the composer asked to be relieved of his post Salamoni, considering the loss of income that Scarlatti would suffer if he went to Rome, was scandalized by the rash decision and wrote that the viceroy, 'out of compassion, or to avoid a serious situation for the chapel', had rejected the musician's request to leave his post and considered him suspended for two months. At the end of that period nothing was heard from Scarlatti, and Ascalona (later to be accused of oppressive and tyrannical behaviour), waited patiently and in vain for seven months for him to return, before advertising a contest to replace the defaulter.

3. Return to Rome. The situation in Rome was not as Scarlatti had imagined. Even if the arrival of Maria Casimira, former Queen of Poland, hinted at a return to the era of Christina, she was a more modest character and her life in Rome was troubled by the rivalry between the Austrians and the 'gallispani'. Pressed by the conflicting claims of the respective ambassadors, Clement XI could not make up his mind which of the contenders he would eventually recognize as King of Spain and sought a solution in collective penitence. In this bleak atmosphere there was no room for opera and Scarlatti had to content himself with oratorios and cantatas for his usual patrons. On 9 January 1703 he was appointed assistant to Giovanni Bicilli, the elderly maestro di cappella of the Congregazione dell'Oratorio di S Filippo Neri at the Chiesa Nuova; their representatives had displayed 'positive repugnance' to accepting Scarlatti, but continued pressure from Ottoboni saw all the obstacles overcome. The document of appointment clarifies that the representatives assigned the post to Scarlatti, who is referred to as the 'distinguished maestro di cappella' and notes his reputation for absenteeism. Given the importance of oratorio in Roman musical life, and the important position of the Chiesa Nuova di S Maria in Vallicella in the genre, Scarlatti's work there assumes particular importance; but he made it clear that he 'expected to take part only during the principal festivities'. When in May 1705 Ottoboni learnt of the situation, he required his protégé 'to come to serve the church or else to leave his post as assistant': Scarlatti resigned, because of 'the many activities that he undertook in composing music in the service of various persons'. Among these activities some were connected with another important post, obtained through Ottoboni: from 31 December 1703 Scarlatti was assistant to the elderly and ailing Antonio Foggia, director of the Cappella Liberiana in S Maria Maggiore. Here too his negligence created discontent among the chapter, but complaints were directed chiefly at his lack of application in teaching and directing the chapel, not at the quantity of sacred music he composed in that particularly productive period.

To console him for his increasing disappointment, Ottoboni appointed Scarlatti one of his 'ministers' in April 1705, but became unhappy and replaced him with Corelli within a year. Scarlatti's self-esteem must have been gratified by his admission to the Arcadian Academy in April 1706, along with Pasquini and Corelli. The account of the admission ceremony shows that Scarlatti was enrolled not only as 'distinguished master of music' but also as 'professor of poetry'.

Living in a city with no opera house remained frustrating to him: during the penitential period the only operatic outlet was that of Ferdinando de' Medici who, between 1702 and 1706, commissioned five operas from Scarlatti to be performed at Pratolino but did not invite the indiscreet composer to take charge of the productions. Accordingly, Scarlatti's correspondence with the prince contains detailed instructions on features indispensable to a satisfactory performance. Ferdinando appreciated

Scarlatti's gifts but did not want to entertain the large Pratolino audience with an essentially aristocratic style; this is why Scarlatti's patron repeatedly recommended that the music should be 'more straightforward and noble' and 'more cheerful' as appropriate. Scarlatti protested his readiness to 'recompose again and again whatever part of the opera, and all of it if need be', but Ferdinando was not satisfied and from 1707 turned to Perti for operas to be performed at Pratolino.

4. Venice. While this crisis was developing, the need to express himself in opera led Scarlatti to look increasingly towards Venice, universally regarded as the Mecca of opera. Domenico went on ahead with a letter to Ferdinando de' Medici, which contains an assessment of the talent of 'an eagle, whose wings have grown and who should not sit idly in the nest'. It is difficult to reconcile Alessandro's declared intention not to impede the little eagle's flight with the imperious tone with which as a father he claims to have 'forcibly removed' Domenico from a Naples increasingly unworthy of his ability, or to 'send him away' from a Rome which 'has no home to receive Music, which lives there like a beggar'. It would have been appropriate to pay his respects to Ferdinando while travelling through Florence. Scarlatti's letter goes further and reveals a desire for the prince to take on Domenico in a permanent position, but this hope was also disappointed; Ferdinando merely assured Alessandro of having noted the eagle's progress and having recommended him to a Venetian patrician who would help him 'display his talent and obtain [fitting] fortune' in Venice, 'where ability should find ever greater welcome and favour'.

Anecdotes apart, there are no records of Domenico's activities in Venice. Alessandro's visit must have been sponsored by Ottoboni; in the librettos of the two operas staged at the S Giovanni Grisostomo, Scarlatti declared himself to be in Ottoboni's service. Considering how widely Scarlatti's operas were performed, it is surprising, but significant, that the Venetian public opera houses remained untouched by them. Venetian composers had managed to stop their rival's work penetrating their stronghold, but now Gasparini and Ottoboni had broken the blockade. But this important visit did not bring the desired results, for the severe dramatic approach of Frigimelica Roberti, librettist of Il trionfo della libertà and Il Mitridate Eupatore, if suited to Scarlatti's austere style, was not to Venetian taste. Il trionfo della libertà, of which only fragments have survived, was apparently more favourably (or less coolly) received; Mitridate Eupatore, a masterpiece (which was to influence Handel), was mercilessly attacked and criticized. Nothing is known of the fate of Cain, overo Il primo omicidio, a magnificent oratorio performed during Lent. With Scarlatti's hopes having failed, he had let himself be drawn by calculating rivals into low gossip, and a chilling document of his human as well as artistic failure is the long, treacherous satire Contro lo Scarlatti, the work of Bartolomeo Dotti.

5. Urbino, Rome. Disappointed at the negative response to his operatic ideals just where he had thought them most likely to succeed, it was a melancholy Scarlatti who set off for home, pausing at Urbino, where his son Pietro was maestro di cappella at the cathedral. All too characteristically, he delayed his return to his post at S Maria Maggiore and, with a desperate but vain hope that help might be forthcoming, he turned once again to Ferdinando de' Medici, telling him of his pathetic state, 'exposed to uncertain human Providence' and unable to 'support the great burden of a large family which, however dressed in the mantle of virtue, is naked of any assistance or favour'. More explicitly than ever, he solicited support for himself and his children, with a lightly-veiled reference to 'he who should never abandon me in time of need'. Ottoboni had not assisted Scarlatti to the extent he hoped, and now Ferdinando's response was merely to invoke 'the necessary consolation of heaven' and to express his conviction that 'success appropriate' to Scarlatti's merits would surely be forthcoming. In the meantime Foggia had died, and in the discussion of a successor the usual doubts were raised about Scarlatti. As early as 1706 the chaplains of S Maria Maggiore had bewailed his lack of diligence; now Ottoboni pressed for him to be appointed, adding the composer's own request for a late arrival 'per totos aestivos calores'. In acceding, the chapter required Scarlatti to agree to ten obligations as maestro di cappella. Alessandro, who had heard the names of other distinguished maestri di cappella interested in succeeding Foggia, declared himself 'paratus ad omnia'.

Returning to Rome in December 1707, Scarlatti found a deteriorating situation. The Queen of Poland arranged a performance of his oratorio La vittoria della fede on 12 September 1708, but the post at S Maria Maggiore and occasional private commissions did not earn Scarlatti the equivalent of the Neapolitan income on which he had turned his back. Suddenly, there appeared a prospect of regaining the salary and the advantages he had lost, through a deus ex machina. A diplomat in Austrian service who had been principally responsible for the expulsion of the Spanish from Naples, Cardinal Vincenzo Grimani was Austrian ambassador to the Holy See. When he was not threatening the pope, or assembling in his Roman palace an army destined to occupy Naples, Grimani was a generous promoter of serenatas and sacred musical events, in competition with Maria Casimira, Ottoboni, Pamphili, the Colonna and Ruspoli families and other ambassadors to Rome. Thanks to his intrigues, the Austrians took over Naples on 7 July, peacefully; Grimani, although out of favour because of his arrogance and open-mindedness, was appointed viceroy. The steps he took to accede to Scarlatti's entreaty of 1 October 1708 to reclaim the direction of the royal chapel were entirely in keeping with his cynicism and hypocrisy. Scarlatti inventively attributed his failure to return to the post in 1703 to the risk of losing 'his life and the honour of his Family' under threat from some unspecified 'foreign minister', and Grimani was quick to satisfy him. It was important to have a musician of Scarlatti's fame to initiate the relaunching of Neapolitan musical life which Grimani desired out of hatred for Rome.

6. Return to Naples. After the bitter experiences of recent years, Naples must have seemed a safe refuge for Scarlatti, now almost 50. To some extent it was; Scarlatti was based there for the remainder of his life, leaving only to visit Rome when commissioned to compose and stage operas. Above all, his departure for Naples left space in Rome for Domenico, who was immediately engaged by the Queen of Poland as her maestro di cappella. Grimani's favour gained Alessandro the renewal of the salary he had received under Viceroy del Carpio, which had been arbitrarily reduced by the Marchese di Villena, as well as the promise of a place as supernumerary organist in the royal chapel for his son Pietro.

A novelty awaited Scarlatti in Naples: to celebrate in triumph the return of a leading figure in the anti-Spanish conspiracy, the Prince of Chiusano had given a performance in his palace on 27 December 1707 of La Cilla, a 'commedia in musica in lingua napolitana'. Its success initiated the popularity of this form of opera buffa, although established composers at first looked upon it with suspicion. Passages in dialect were already to be found in the comic scenes of serious operas and even in some oratorios; during his visit to Venice Scarlatti had tried composing a cantata in Venetian dialect, but his encounters with Neapolitan vernacular might be thought limited to a single cantata (Ammore, brutto figlio de pottana), a colourful invective against Cupid; the text is surprisingly coarse and far from the elevated tone of Alessandro's other cantatas. This picturesque piece may in fact be the work of a lesser Scarlatti, probably Francesco.

While he continued to compose heroic operas, formal serenatas, cantatas and sacred music, Scarlatti left the writing of operas in this new genre to other members of his family. But he played a hidden role in their various attempts: two arias from Gli inganni felici, for example, were slipped into the score of Francesco Scarlatti's Petracchio scremmetore, staged in Aversa in 1711.

To break away from heroic operas or serenatas, without sinking to a level which might have seemed indecorous, Scarlatti significantly chose the 1718 season, when the impresario of the Teatro dei Fiorentini in Naples had decided to switch the comedies 'from the Neapolitan idiom to the Tuscan, no longer with heroic and regal action but with domestic, family events'. The author of the texts was Francescantonio Tullio, the best dialect librettist of the day (70 years later, Napoli Signorelli took him to task for giving up 'the strongest part of his armoury, the grace of his native language, which he possessed to perfection'). Scarlatti avoided tarantellas, arias with colascione accompaniment and the other typical successes of the new Neapolitan opera buffa, and the score of Il trionfo dell'onore is consistently close in style to his serious operas, with the usual mixture of serious elements and caricature.

Although Scarlatti's fame grew in this final phase of his career, success eluded him. It was at this time that he chose to demonstrate his inexhaustible creativity, when in fact it was slowing down. In 1705, when he sent Il Tito Manlio to Ferdinando de' Medici, he had declared that it was the 88th of his 'operas composed in less than 23 years'. The prefaces of subsequent librettos often give an 'opus number', which reaches 114 with La Griselda (1722). Il Cambise, his last Neapolitan opera, dates from 1719; the composer did not take part in its performance as he was in Rome staging Marco Attilio Regolo at the Capranica. The previous year the impresario of that theatre, financed by Prince Ruspoli, had asked him for Il Telemaco for the carnival season; it must have been a success, for in subsequent years all Scarlatti's mature operas were reserved for Rome, where papal disapproval was much diminished. Even within the Curia the old prejudice must have disappeared, for in 1716 Clement XI conferred the title of 'Cavaliere' on the composer.

A reduction in operatic output, coupled with a desire to emulate the successes of Pasquini and Corelli in instrumental music, led to Scarlatti's taking a late interest in this area, which he had earlier neglected. A lifetime of bitter experience induced him to carry out his duties as maestro di cappella more diligently, as documents published by Cotticelli and Maione (1993) reveal. As he grew older his character must also have softened, with positive effects on his teaching: in his stressful years it had seemed wise to entrust the finishing of Domenico's musical training to Gasparini, and while even in 1708 an 'acute difference' had led the young Zipoli to leave Naples, where he had been sent by the Grand Duke of Tuscany to study with Scarlatti, only a few years later Geminiani and possibly Cotumacci (as he told Burney) benefited from his teaching. In his last years Scarlatti showed the 'benevolence of a father' to Hasse, who managed to present

Quantz to him, overcoming his aversion to wind players' imperfect intonation.

On 15 June 1723 the Naples Avvisi gave the last account of a performance of a work by Scarlatti: the Prince of Stigliano was celebrating his marriage with L'Erminia, a serenata 'set to music by Cav. Scarlatti, for whom no praise is sufficient, and of whom it can truly be said that as he increases in age so all the more does he acquire new and sublime ideas in his compositions'.

Recently published documents (Cotticelli and Maione) make it clear that even at the end of his life Scarlatti suffered financial hardship: a dramatic plea to the viceroy ten days before his death lays bare the humiliation of the 'most poor and miserable Cavaliere Alessandro Scarlatti Primo Maestro della Real Cappella', who 'engulfed by his countless misfortunes ... now finds himself in such extreme need of his daily bread that he has started to ask for the assistance of secret alms'. This was partly because his salary had not been paid for four months and he had undergone a series of misfortunes culminating in the 'loss of a daughter after six continuous months of desperate and costly infirmity'. The Avviso di Napoli of 30 October 1725 states that 'In the last week the famous Alessandro Scarlatti, to whom Music owes so much for the many works with which he has enriched it, gave up his soul'. The tombstone, in Ottoboni's words, declares Scarlatti a 'supreme musical innovator' and remembers him as 'most dear to aristocrats and monarchs'. Two further entreaties from his widow reveal that nothing had been done to alleviate the dying man's straits, and that little attention was paid to the desperate state in which the family found itself, burdened with debts.

7. Operas. Scarlatti has often been referred to as 'the founder of Neapolitan opera', but it is only with strong reservations that this and similar epithets can be justified. As a composer he was brought up in Rome, and it was for Rome that his earliest operas, and many of his later ones, were composed. As far as both music and libretto are concerned, only one of his operas, Il trionfo dell'onore (1718), might be considered truly Neapolitan in character; the others are more representative of a pan-Italian style with its roots in 17th-century Venetian opera. And although J.A. Hasse probably studied with Scarlatti for a time, there is little in Hasse's operatic style, or for that matter in the style of native Neapolitans such as Leo, Vinci and Porpora (who might with some justification be said to constitute a Neapolitan school), that can be shown to stem directly from him.

Scarlatti's earliest encounters with opera were probably in Palermo, where his father was a professional musician and his uncle Vincenzo Amato reputedly composed at least two operas, and where the singer and opera composer Marcantonio Sportonio was a close friend of the family. In Rome, from 1672, he would have become familiar with Venetian imports and with new Roman operas, particularly those of Bernardo Pasquini. His own first opportunity to compose opera came in 1677, when he was invited to provide a work for performance at the palace of Pietro Filippo Bernini early the following year. It must have caused the young composer (not yet 18) much disappointment when its production was cancelled after Pope Innocent XI banned stage entertainments during Carnival. The only surviving score, which bears neither title nor composer's name, remained unrecognized in the Vatican Library until 1986 (see Lionnet). Scarlatti no doubt found its plot particularly relevant to his own condition, since it concerns the fortunes (and love affairs) of a brother and sister forced to leave Sicily during troublous times and to start a new life in Tuscolo (present-day Frascati).

Just over a year later Scarlatti was able to establish a firm foothold as an opera composer with Gli equivoci nel sembiante, to a libretto by Domenico Filippo Contini, possibly a relation of the architect Giambattista Contini, in whose private theatre the opera was given. Like Scarlatti's first opera, this is an intimate pastoral comedy with a single outdoor set and a small cast accompanied by a few string instruments and continuo. Its first audiences seem to have been attracted above all by the tunefulness of the arias. These are mostly in the ternary form that was to predominate even more in the later operas, but at this stage Scarlatti frequently varied or extended the first section on its repeat – a practice he abandoned as the length of each section, and the number of arias he was called upon to write, gradually increased.

Gli equivoci enjoyed enormous success and attracted the attention of Queen Christina of Sweden, at whose palace Scarlatti's third opera, L'honestà negli amori, was performed in February 1680. This and Tutto il mal non vien per nuocere (1681) are in much the same vein as the earlier pieces, but with Pompeo (1683), written for the private theatre of another Roman patron, Cardinal Colonna, the composer produced the first of many heroic dramas based on episodes from Roman history. The tally of operas from his first Roman period is completed with La guerriera costante (also 1683). Of the six operas known from these years, only Tutto il mal was produced in the public theatre in Rome, the Capranica. To further his career in opera Scarlatti needed to free himself from the restrictions that made public opera such a risky (and for much of the time impossible) enterprise in Rome. The chance came when the new viceroy of Naples, the Marquis del Carpio (no doubt prompted by his friend the Duke of Maddaloni, who had introduced Gli equivoci to the Neapolitans and was shortly to do the same for Pompeo) called on Scarlatti to take charge of the 1684–5 season at the Teatro S Bartolomeo.

The normal practice at Naples was for a new opera to be seen first in the viceroy's private theatre and then to transfer to the adjacent public theatre, the S Bartolomeo, in which the viceroy took a controlling interest. During his first period as maestro di cappella there (1684–1702), Scarlatti wrote at least 32 operas for these theatres, of which fewer than half have survived complete; the others are known only from librettos and, in some cases, aria collections. Scarlatti was also responsible for making adaptations of the Venetian operas that continued to provide the staple operatic diet at Naples, though the extent of his involvement in the process of rifacimento is difficult to gauge. Strohm (1975; Eng. trans., 1985, p.18) argued that it was minimal, but it is difficult to account for the claims made in contemporary librettos or in the scores themselves that, for example, Penelope la casta (1696) was Scarlatti's 60th opera or Lucio Manlio l'imperioso (1705) his 88th unless we assume the total to include collaborative ventures such as La santa Dinna (1687, Rome) as well as rifacimenti with an appreciable amount of new composition.

Scarlatti does, however, seem to have been concerned above all with the composition of completely new works during this period, especially after 1696, when his patron and admirer the Duke of Medinaceli succeeded Del Carpio as viceroy and took personal control of the Teatro S Bartolomeo. Such works as Pirro e Demetrio (1694), which enjoyed international success and was the only Scarlatti opera to be seen in London during the composer's lifetime, and La caduta de' Decemviri (1697), his first collaboration with one of his most important librettists, Silvio Stampiglia, show the composer at the pinnacle of his fame in the theatre. In the opinion of Lorenz (1927), La caduta also marks a new departure in the development of Scarlatti's operatic style, a view not shared by Grout (1979). While much in La caduta, particularly the regular alternation of simple recitative and da capo aria, must be seen as a continuation of stylistic trends seen in earlier works, the opera does break with tradition in one respect: the older type of Venetian instrumental prelude, typically a slow, homophonic section in duple or quadruple metre followed by a quick dance-like movement in triple time and perhaps a second fast movement, is here replaced by the so-called Italian overture that soon became the norm in Scarlatti's operas and those of other composers. In this a fast, homophonic section, usually with rushing scales or trumpet-like figures, is succeeded by a short, slow chordal section which is often no more than a link between the opening Allegro and the final binary dance movement, again in quick tempo.

Other stylistic developments of Scarlatti's first Naples period (though not specifically in La caduta) include a sharper distinction between recitative and aria, the former adopting an even more parlando style and several standard harmonic and melodic formulae, particularly at cadences. The arias remain as numerous as in the earlier operas, but second strophes are abandoned and there is greater diversity in the instrumentation. Other changes reflect more general ones of the period: an enrichment of the harmonic vocabulary (for example in the expressive use of the diminished 7th chord) and a vogue for 12/8 siciliana rhythms. During these years Scarlatti remained in close contact with his Roman patrons, especially the cardinals Pamphili and Ottoboni, and the same stylistic features can be seen in the operas he wrote for them. These include Statira, composed for the reopening of the Tordinona theatre in 1690 to a libretto by Ottoboni himself.

In December 1701 Medinaceli, censured by Madrid (and subsequently replaced) for his bloody quelling of a pro-Austrian conspiracy among the Neapolitan nobles, withdrew his usual subvention of 4000 ducats for the coming season at the S Bartolomeo; the company was now forced to rely on public support. This dwindled after the cool reception of Aldrovandini's Semiramide in December, and the season was saved only by the success of Scarlatti's Tito Sempronio Gracco the following February. Although Scarlatti himself later hinted at darker reasons (see §1), the uncertain future of opera at Naples must have influenced his decision to leave the city and try his luck elsewhere. His departure was delayed until June 1702 by a visit to Naples by King Philip V of Spain; to mark the occasion Scarlatti composed Tiberio imperatore d'Oriente, and he then travelled to Florence, by way of Rome, arriving there probably in early August. Flavio Cuniberto was staged the following month in the private theatre of Prince Ferdinando de' Medici at Pratolino. The prince had already promoted Scarlatti's operas in several north Italian cities and had commissioned at least one new one from him, probably La serva favorita (1689). The operas that Scarlatti went on to compose for Pratolino each September until 1706, while working as a church musician in Rome, were all of the heroic type, with librettos based on incidents from Roman history; but the scores have not survived and all that remains of this period in Scarlatti's operatic career are a few isolated arias and an exchange of letters with Prince Ferdinando which throws valuable light on the composer's working methods and the nature of an opera's gestation.

In 1705 Scarlatti had sent his son Domenico off to Venice 'to take whatever opportunities arise to make his name' (as he wrote in a famous letter to Prince Ferdinando), and it was to Venice that he himself turned, some 18 months later, when his Pratolino commissions came to an end. The two works he composed for Carnival 1707 at Venice's most prestigious opera house, the Teatro S Giovanni Grisostomo, were Mitridate Eupatore and Il trionfo della libertà, and they stand apart from his others in several respects. Their librettos, by Girolamo Frigimelica Roberti, include ballets but no comic scenes; unlike the other librettos Scarlatti set, they are designated tragedie and, like the classical French tragedies by which Frigimelica Roberti was strongly influenced, they are in five acts rather than the more usual three. Moreover, Mitridate (the only one of the two to survive) differs from Scarlatti's other heroic operas in having neither involved love intrigues nor a magnanimous tyrant. Dent (1905) drew attention to the libretto's architectural qualities, Grout (1979) to its obsession with political doctrine.

Reasons why both operas failed to please their audiences in 1707 have been outlined above (see §4). They include a xenophobic tendency on the part of the Venetians (it is noticeable that Frigimelica Roberti's other 'reform' librettos met with success in settings by C.F. Pollarolo, Caldara and Mancia, all from the Veneto), the composer's own arrogant and condescending attitude towards the theatre management and (most important perhaps) those qualities in the music that we most admire today – its high seriousness, inventive instrumentation and contrapuntal textures. The Venetian operagoers may have preferred something less demanding, with tuneful melodies and light accompaniments. Mitridate, in short, like Mozart's Die Entführung later, was perhaps found to contain 'too many notes'. This, at any rate, was a reaction strongly expressed in a malicious satire by Bartolomeo Dotti which, among other even more damning observations, referred to the soporific effect that the music had on the audiences at S Giovanni Grisostomo.

When a new Austrian viceroy, Cardinal Grimani, was appointed in Naples in 1708, Scarlatti seized the opportunity to petition for restitution of his post as maestro di cappella. During the 15 years that remained to him he composed at least another 15 new operas, most of them first performed in Naples. But it is plain that changes in operatic style were moving against him, and Teodosio, produced at S Bartolomeo only a few weeks after his return to Naples, earned the censure of the Bolognese Count Francesco Maria Zambeccari, who in a letter of 16 April 1709 spoke of Scarlatti as > a great man, so good indeed that he succeeds ill because his compositions are extremely difficult and in the chamber style, and so do not succeed in the theatre. In primis, those who understand counterpoint will admire him, but in a theatre audience of 1000 people there are not 20 who do understand it, and the rest, not hearing cheerful and theatrical things, are bored. Also, the music being so difficult, the singer has to be extremely careful not to make a slip, and is therefore unable to make the gestures he is used to making and becomes too tired. Thus, [Scarlatti's] theatre style is not pleasing to most audiences, who want cheerful stuff and saltarelli such as they get in Venice.

Zambeccari's criticism, like Dotti's, undoubtedly sprang from motives that were not entirely disinterested, but there is some truth in what he said, and Scarlatti was not the first (or the last) composer to find the tide of popular taste running against him. None of his serious operas after 1708 enjoyed anything like the success of his early Roman operas or some of those he produced during his first, prolific Neapolitan period. Among the most successful of the late operas was Tigrane (1715), described by Grout (1979) as 'one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, of Scarlatti's operas', but only the comedy Il trionfo dell'onore, given 18 times at the Teatro dei Fiorentini in 1718, can be said to have been a hit; even this was not revived during his lifetime. It is surely significant that, except for Cambise (1719), all Scarlatti's serious operas after 1716 were intended for performance in Rome, where conservative patrons and audiences were more receptive to a style rapidly becoming outmoded in Naples. These include his last known opera, Griselda (1721), as well as extensive rifacimenti of two others originally written for Pratolino, Tito Sempronio Gracco and Turno Aricino.

In style and structure the operas of Scarlatti's final period are not radically different from those he was writing in the late 1690s: the Italian overture, arias and duets remain the main formal components, and the conventions of recitative have not greatly changed. There is no attempt to create a musical span more extended than that of a da capo aria, although a move towards greater continuity is evident, above all in a more extensive use of accompanied recitative. The proportions of the lyrical items do, however, show a gradual expansion which leads, of course, to a reduction in their number. La caduta de' Decemviri (1697), for example, contained no fewer than 62 arias and duets; Griselda has 41. This expansion is paralleled by an increase in the richness and variety of the accompanying instrumentation: continuo arias are quite rare in the late operas, accompanied recitative much more common.

Despite Scarlatti's central position as an opera composer, he seems to have had little influence on the course of operatic history. Most of the 'innovations' with which he has at times been credited – the da capo aria, accompanied recitative, the introduction of french horns into the opera pit, the creation of the Italian overture – can be shown to predate him, while the music itself is seen now more as a refinement of 17th-century styles than as a harbinger of the Classical period.

8. Oratorios, serenatas. The Italian oratorio of the late Baroque has often been viewed by modern historians as a kind of substitute for opera during Lent, when the theatres were closed. It is easy to see why. Both genres have the same formal constituents: an instrumental overture (after about 1700 usually of the 'Italian' type), recitative (both simple and accompanied) and arias, duets and occasionally larger ensemble numbers (almost exclusively in da capo form). Moreover, the librettos of both were predominantly dramatic in concept, and oratorios were performed by the same singers who appeared in the opera house. In certain other equally important respects, however, the oratorio stood in much closer relation to the serenata. Not only did the serenata embody all the features of the oratorio so far mentioned, but it was also divided, like the oratorio, into two parts (not into three acts, like the opera), was of comparable length (considerably shorter than the average opera) and was produced, in the vast majority of cases, without action, costumes or scenery (though both oratorios and serenatas were often performed in front of an elaborate backcloth).

Most of Scarlatti's oratorios were written for Rome, where the genre originated and where it continued to flourish (partly, no doubt, because of papal opposition to opera there). Of the six Latin oratorios which he is known to have composed for the Arciconfraternita del SS Crocifisso, only one, Davidis pugna et victoria, survives. It was performed at the Crocifisso in 1700, but several elements in the score – the antiquated structure of its two-movement sinfonia, its inclusion of ground bass and strophic arias, the presence of a testo (narrator) and the employment of a harmonic vocabulary that admits the Neapolitan 6th but not the diminished 7th – suggest a much earlier composition date. It may indeed have been a revival of one of the three oratorios written for the Crocifisso between 1679 and 1682 of which not even the title is known. A particular (and again archaic) feature of the work is the writing for double chorus, representing the opposing forces of the Hebrews and the Philistines, and the occasional division of the orchestra into concertino and concerto grosso in the manner of Stradella.

More representative of Scarlatti's oratorios in general is his second work on the subject of Judith's liberation of Bethulia, performed in Rome in March 1697 (an earlier oratorio on the same story was performed in Naples three or four years earlier). The 'Cambridge' Giuditta (so-called because its only known source is in the library of King's College, Cambridge) calls for only three singers, representing Judith, her nurse and Holofernes; there is no chorus. Of the 22 arias, 14 are in da capo form; there are no second strophes and only one ground bass (a duet between Judith and the nurse in Part 1). Accompaniments are mostly for continuo only, with a final 'ritornello' for the strings, but Giuditta's 'Chi m'addita, per pietà' in Part 1 is unusual in being accompanied only by violins and violas in unison, and her 'Tu che desti, o eterno Nume' in Part 2 is noteworthy for its particularly virtuoso solo violin obbligato.

If, as seems likely, Giuditta was performed in the palace of one of Scarlatti's Roman patrons, its two parts were no doubt separated not by a sermon, as was the custom in an oratory, but by convivial eating and drinking – another feature that tied the oratorio to the serenata. The close rapprochement between the two genres (and that of the cantata; see Gianturco, 1992 and Marx, 1992) is particularly evident in the Christmas entertainments enjoyed at the Vatican each Christmas Eve between 1676 and 1740, when the performance of a work, variously designated 'componimento', 'concerto' or 'cantata', was followed by a feast for the assembled cardinals. Scarlatti was chosen as the composer on four occasions, in 1695 and 1705–7.

The sequence of dramatic and semi-dramatic representations provided by opera (during Carnival) and oratorio (during Lent and at Easter) was continued during the summer months by the serenata. This differed from the oratorio mainly by virtue of its secular, often overtly political text and its open-air performance. Serenatas could be performed, like oratorios, on a temporary stage indoors; however, they were typically presented of an evening in the courtyard of a palace or in a more public piazza. Performances on water were also common: in Venice on the Grand Canal, in Naples at the bay of Posillipo and in Rome in the Piazza Navona, which was regularly flooded for the purpose. Between the two parts, sumptuous refreshments were served to the distinguished guests, while mountains of more common fare were 'sacked' by the hoi polloi. Outdoor performance encouraged the use of a large band, and occasionally a chorus. The Gazzetta di Napoli (31 July 1696), reporting on a performance of Scarlatti's Il trionfo delle stagioni five days earlier, mentioned the participation of more than 150 instrumentalists and 50 singers (Griffin, 1983, pp.243, 245) – possibly an exaggeration, but an indication nevertheless of the scale of these performances.

9. CHURCH MUSIC. Although it occupies a substantial proportion of his total output, Scarlatti's church music has remained relatively unexplored, and little of it is available in modern editions. Like other church composers of the period, especially perhaps those working in Rome, Scarlatti had to become musically bilingual, and his masses, motets and other liturgical works show equal mastery of the stile antico and the modern concertato style.

Of the ten extant complete masses (including one requiem mass), all but two are a cappella or accompanied only by organ. One would not expect to find in these many signs of Scarlatti's originality. He treats what he once referred to as 'lo stile sodo alla Palestrina' with a certain liberty (unprepared 7ths, minim passing notes and dissonant crotchets are all more abundant than in the older master's works) and with a leaning towards major-minor tonality, but his contrapuntal skill is much in evidence and two of the masses show extensive and resourceful use of canon. About half of the motets also use stile antico technique. Among the best-known of them today is Tu es Petrus, a double-choir motet much admired also by Scarlatti's contemporaries to judge from the number of extant manuscript copies.

Of the two stile moderno masses, the St Cecilia Mass, composed for Cardinal Acquaviva in Rome, is a lively setting for five solo voices and ripienists with strings and continuo. Its organization on the lines of a cantata mass, with each subsection having its tonal integrity, encourages contrast, for example between soloistic virtuosity and choral weight and between the sober homophony of 'Et in terra pax' in the Gloria and the fugal climax of that section at 'Cum Sancto Spiritu'. As in the gradual Audi filia, composed for the same celebration in 1720, the emphasis is on solo singing; in the gradual the ripienists are not heard until the final 'Alleluia', and even then only in relatively brief passages.

Some of Scarlatti's solo motets come close in style to the secular cantata da camera; Jam sole clarior for soprano, violins and continuo, for example, is a highly florid setting consisting of three da capo arias separated by recitative. Scriptural and liturgical texts, however, provide relatively few opportunities for recitative and da capo arias, and it is the absence of these which in many cases differentiates the stile moderno motets from the cantatas, and the masses from the oratorios. Scarlatti does, however, often employ an instrumental ritornello as a unifying element in a motet or mass section. Another, more archaic means of achieving unity is through the use of a plainchant cantus firmus. At least ten of Scarlatti's psalm settings include a plainchant melody, as also does the Magnificat primo tono (see Shaffer). One might expect this to be a feature particular to stile antico compositions, but in fact it is found just as frequently in the moderno pieces. In the St Cecilia Mass, for example, the plainsong introit 'Loquebar de testimoniis tuis' is quoted in long notes by the two solo sopranos in unison at 'Et unam sanctam catholicam et apostolicam ecclesiam' in the Credo.

The motet Jam sole clarior is from the Concerti sacri op.2 (1707–8), and is therefore one of Scarlatti's very few works to appear in print during his lifetime. His other liturgical works include an extensive collection of music (hymns, psalms, lamentations and responsories) for Holy week, most of it composed for Prince Ferdinando de' Medici in Florence. The St John Passion, dating from about 1680, occupies an isolated position among his sacred works. It is a sober setting of the Latin Gospel text without extraneous tropes, retrospective in style (even for such an early work) but not inexpressive. The strings provide a brief introduction, immediately repeated to accompany the intoning of the work's title, 'Passio Domini nostri Jesu Christi' by the testo (narrator); thereafter they serve to support the turba choruses, the words of Christ and occasionally those of the testo, a role that breaks with tradition in being sung not by a tenor but by an alto.

10. CANTATAS. Scarlatti's chamber cantatas reveal perhaps more strikingly than any other class of his works his unbroken continuity with preceding phases of the Baroque era and his separation from the following period. With more than 600 known cantatas for which his authorship is reasonably certain and well over 100 others less reliably attributed to him, he is clearly the most prolific cantata composer. These works crown the history of a genre which over more than a century of vigorous growth held a rank second only to opera; indeed contemporaries generally placed it above opera in refinement and regarded it as the supreme challenge to a composer's artistry. Scarlatti was among the last to contribute significantly to its literature.

A decisive majority of Scarlatti's cantatas are for solo voice, most for soprano but some for alto and a few for bass. A few are for two voices: two sopranos, soprano and alto, or soprano and bass. 90% are accompanied by continuo alone; the remainder, reflecting a contemporary trend, enlist various instrumental ensembles in addition to continuo, mostly strings but occasionally recorders or trumpet. They deal almost exclusively with love; heroic, comic or devotional subjects appear less often than in the past.

The most characteristic text is lyric, presenting in some imagined protagonist's monologue a series of contrasting reflections centred on some unifying thought. In most cantatas for two voices there is dialogue or an alternation between dialogue and lyric monologue. The protagonist is usually a shepherd or nymph, or may be drawn from mythology or history. Occasionally the monologue is introduced by an explicatory narrative or descriptive passage, and further narrative passages may thread the reflections together. The changes are normally paralleled by changes of poetic metre and rhyme pattern, and reflected too in changes in musical metre, tempo, rhythmic and melodic material, harmonic character, texture and the entire constellation of stylistic elements.

The cantata repertory in Rome in the 1670s included works not only by younger composers, such as Stradella, Pasquini and P.S. Agostini, but by composers of older generations too, including Cesti, Savioni, Carissimi and even Luigi Rossi (d 1653). Scarlatti drew comprehensively on this stylistic inheritance. The retrospective characteristics in his cantatas composed before about 1705 are striking. Musical refrains continue to appear as reflections of textual ones, either with periodic regularity or at irregular intervals. Exact or modified musical repetitions – occasionally only loose, imprecise correspondences – with new words reflect strophes in the texts. Not infrequently, however, a second strophe in the text is set to new music, preserving only a structural parallelism with that of the first; and a second strophe may be separated from the first by intervening sections. Responsiveness to his texts according to such procedures sometimes gives rise to forms that had flourished in earlier decades but, it seems, had been laid aside by Scarlatti's immediate predecessors, Pasquini and Agostini.

O dolce servitù, the verse of which is in part strophic, resembles in structure many cantatas of around the 1640s (like Rossi's Da perfida speranza): the first strophe consists of a 4/4 section in aria style, a short recitative and a 3/2 arioso. This entire complex is repeated, in part exactly, with the second strophe of the text. Sometimes only the first strophe's bass is repeated (only its pitches, its rhythm having been substantially altered) while the vocal line is in part newly composed: here Scarlatti reached back to the strophic variation, a structure prominent in the cantata's earliest history. An arrangement characteristic of the mid-century cantata survives in Chi vedesse la ferita: ABCAB′C′A, where A is a refrain in music and text while B′C′ is a musical repetition of BC with a second strophe of its text (a similar arrangement is found in Carissimi's Bel tempo per me).

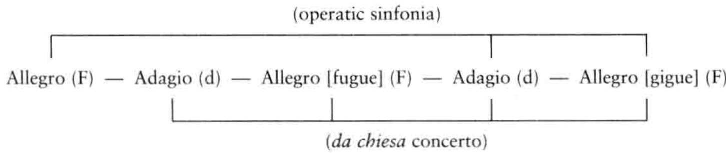
In most of Scarlatti's cantatas, late as well as early, diversification is especially conspicuous in composite structures comprising more or less discrete recitatives, arias and ariosos. In works from before about 1705 they appear in the limitlessly varied combinations seen in the past, reflecting long, complicated poetic structures in which sections in various metres and rhyme patterns follow one another in unruly, wayward succession; these in turn reflect unruly successions of contrasting passions. Such arias continue to show the formal variety found in the past, including ABB′ and related patterns (as old as Monteverdi), AB, ostinato arias, and the increasingly popular ABA and ABA′. Most have two strophes. In cantatas with instrumental ensemble many are continuo arias with ritornellos, resembling forms in contemporary operas. Recitatives continue to incorporate lyrical, expressive arioso, with refrains and other organizing devices. The integration of declamatory and aria-like elements often survives in Scarlatti's cantata recitatives. The 'curious mixture of air and recitative' with which Solitudini amene, bersaglio (1705) begins did not escape Burney's notice (BurneyH, ii, 630, 634).

A more orderly form, perhaps manifesting the spirit of the Age of Reason, became increasingly prominent in Scarlatti's cantatas in the 1690s: two (sometimes three) da capo arias contrasting in tempo and expressive character, each preceded by a recitative. Second strophes and refrains were laid aside. In his cantatas after 1704 significant deviations from this pattern are exceptional. A search for increased intensity of expression often gave rise to chromaticism, which is especially characteristic of recitatives, as is illustrated in the celebrated Andate, o miei sospiri ('Con idea inhumana', 1712). Notes in the most authoritative copies of this work suggest that Francesco Gasparini had presented Scarlatti with his setting as a token of friendship and that Scarlatti responded with two settings of his own, the first 'Con idea humana' and the second 'Con idea inhumana, ma in regolato Cromatico, non è per ogni Professore'. Both typify his mature style at its most beautiful, and the recitatives of the second are further distinguished by unusually daring chromaticisms.



Already singular in his time, Scarlatti's recitative frequently became even more alien through bold chromaticism, to a degree that his contemporaries could no longer accept. In 1728 J.D. Heinichen censured Scarlatti's 'extravagant and irregular harmony ... as revealed in the vast production of his cantatas' (Der General-Bass in der Composition). Encumbrance with chromaticism, he protested, prevented their attaining the quality of 'rapid recitative'. His strictures reveal that a new conception of recitative had established itself, the rapid parlando, often characterized further by expressive impoverishment and flatness. Regarding this later conception as the norm, Heinichen rejected the impassioned Scarlattian form as 'unnatural and violent'. In the decade when the 'Neapolitan' style triumphantly conquered the European repertory, a contemporary saw Scarlatti not as the founder of any school but as a lonely eccentric, followed by no one except perhaps d'Astorga.

Scarlatti's cantatas for two voices take various forms. Most are composite structures. Usually a singer delivers on each entry a recitative followed by an aria. Some recitatives engage both singers in rapid dialogue. The concluding section is usually a duet aria or arioso, and most cantatas include additional duet arias. Some open with a duet aria and close with a repetition of it or with a repetition of its music set to the words of a second strophe; some consist wholly of duets. The duet arias rely chiefly on the trio texture developed by Monteverdi and basic to musical style throughout the Baroque era. The bass functions harmonically, but it is nevertheless active and melodically defined; it holds consistently apart, however, from the melody, imitations and parallels of the upper pair.

11. Instrumental music. The interest and importance of Scarlatti's instrumental works is in direct proportion to their number. One would hardly recognize the father of Domenco Scarlatti from the keyboard works that have survived, most of which seem to have acted as pupil fodder. A didactic intention is in fact explicit in the seven Toccate per cembalo (I-Nc), which are aimed at encouraging a 'nobile portamento delle mani'. Except for the second, these are multi-sectional pieces obviously designed mainly to develop Fingerfertigkeit in both hands; they make room for three fugal sections and two binary dance movements. The first toccata is fingered throughout its 158 bars, making it a valuable document for Baroque keyboard technique.

Of greater artistic value are the 12 Sinfonie di concerto grosso. Scarlatti probably decided on this unusual, perhaps unique, title to indicate that the string parts are to be played orchestrally (each sinfonia includes at least one wind instrument as well) rather than by one player to a part, but the title has perhaps wider implications. No.7 in G is a straightforward Corellian da chiesa concerto in four movements, but the others are mostly five-movement works combining features of the three-movement operatic sinfonia and the da chiesa concerto. No.1 in F shows the quite typical layout displayed in Table 1.

The opening Allegro abounds in the busy, rather empty semiquaver figuration associated with the first movement of an Italian overture (the figuration is even busier and emptier in some of the other works), while the final binary dance is a feature common to both genres; of the other movements, it is the central fugue that owes most to the example of the Corellian concerto. All 12 sinfonias are attractive, well-written pieces and are unaccountably neglected.

A similar structure can be observed in the third of the VI Concertos in Seven Parts published in London by Benjamin Cooke about 1740, but the provenance and attribution of this set as a whole remains problematic. Most of the instrumental chamber music is similarly of uncertain attribution or little distinction.

12. Reputation and influence. It was only in his youth that Alessandro Scarlatti enjoyed a degree of popular success equal to his reputation. Throughout his career there was an increasing gulf between the high opinion of his contemporaries and the actual success of his works. Before he was 20, the young Sicilian had impressed the most knowledgeable patrons in Rome with his rich melodic imagination, and after the remarkable success of Gli equivoci nel sembiante the Berninis entrusted to him the composition of L'honestà degli amori, a comic opera for their theatre with a libretto containing humorous allusions to the success of a musician who had come 'from the limits of Christendom full of airs' (lines he took care not to set).

Scarlatti was perfectly conscious of his standing in a hierarchical society, but cultivated utopian ideals of breaking down barriers created by birth or income, to be realized through an understanding among superior spirits. The evidence suggests that an understanding of this nature characterized only his relationship with Queen Christina. Ferdinando de' Medici and Ottoboni were too concerned with the success of what they had commissioned to be gratified by recognition of their judgment, implied by the quality of the work even if it failed to arouse public enthusiasm. It is to Scarlatti's credit that the need to earn money imposed on him by 'the heavy burden of a large family' never led him to make the kinds of compromise or concession by which he might have gained wider recognition.

The Arcadian Academy had the most to offer in the fulfilment of Scarlatti's ambitions. Enrolled at the same time were Pasquini and Corelli, musicians with whom he had shared Queen Christina's favour; and the academic assemblies provided an ideal arena for the poetical and musical tournaments to which Scarlatti rightly considered himself supremely suited. The form of the cantata was fertile territory for experimentation. His famous exchange with Gasparini was realized in the spirit of rivalry at the very highest level: in 1712 Gasparini, admitted to the Academy on Corelli's death, had paid homage to his colleague in Andate, o miei sospiri, al cor d'Irene, a piece devoted to the pains of one unlucky in love. Scarlatti was not content simply to reply by setting the same text as a 'Cantata alla amicizia, fatta con idea humana' (marked by harmonic subtleties to interest its accomplished recipient), but produced a second, highly sophisticated version, describing it as the 'same cantata, on an inhuman idea', proudly adding 'it is not for every professor'.

Despite his unhappy experiences in Florence and Venice, Scarlatti retained his artistic integrity. This explains the judgment of F.M. Zambeccari, the music lover originally from Bologna, then living in Naples in Grimani's retinue: 'he is a great man, so good indeed that he succeeds ill because his compositions are extremely difficult and in the chamber style, and so do not succeed in the theatre'. Not for the first time he was berated for subtleties above the heads of the general public, who loved the 'cheerful stuff and saltarelli such as they get in Venice'. The bias is obvious, the more so since Zambeccari excused Scarlatti's cool reception but could not stomach the 'knavish stuff in the Neapolitan language' which perfectly matched popular taste. This was the key to Scarlatti's fate: here was a musician of genius who had to forgo the kind of praise from sensitive patrons like those who 20 years later would appreciate the 'happy and original freaks' of Domenico's astonishing sonatas.

However, Alessandro Scarlatti's reputation remained unchallenged: clear confirmation of this appears in Burney (Burney GN, 347) when he recounts that Hasse > could not think Durante, as a contrapuntist, deserved the place which M. Rousseau has given him in his dictionary; but said that it was old Scarlatti, whom he should have called le plus grand harmoniste d'Italie, c'est à dire du monde, the greatest master of harmony of Italy, that is, of the whole universe; and not Durante, who was not only dry, but baroque, that is, coarse and uncouth.

Burney adds, in a note, 'M. Hasse's opinion of Alex. Scarlatti, corresponds exactly with that of Jomelli, who told me, at Naples, that his compositions for the church, tho' but little known, were the best of his productions, and perhaps the best of the kind'. Jommelli was only 11 when Scarlatti died and had arrived in Naples from his native Aversa in 1725; his evidence therefore indicates that Scarlatti's sacred music at least was studied with interest by the younger generation. In Naples, the 'baroque' Durante transformed 12 items from Scarlatti's cantatas into 12 Duetti da camera for use by singing teachers as a helpful contrast between the teacher's and the pupil's voice. The success of these duets gave the music of Scarlatti's cantatas an artificial after-life: in the middle of the 19th century the Marchese di Villarosa could claim that without them Scarlatti's name would have been consigned to oblivion. The pattern has persisted: although Alessandro Scarlatti is considered a composer of primary importance in all the literature, little attention is paid to his work, and even in recent explorations of the 'early music' repertory his music, for all its reputation, has played an exceedingly modest part.

(2) Anna Maria Scarlatti (b Palermo, 8 Dec 1661; d Naples, 14 Dec 1703). Singer, sister of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti. She went to Rome in June 1672 with her mother, Alessandro and younger sister (3) Melchiorra. She sang professionally from at least 1680, when she performed in P.S. Agostini's Il ratto delle Sabine, along with the renowned G.F. Grassi ('Siface') and Francesco de Castris, at the Teatro S Giovanni Grisostomo, Venice. In 1679 she caused difficulties for Alessandro in Rome 'on account of [her] secret marriage with an ecclesiastic [Paolo Massonio Astro Lusco]', as the Avvisi di Roma reported. It is doubtful whether either she or her sister was one of the 'puttane commedianti' involved in a scandalous traffic in public offices (including the appointment of the maestro di cappella at the Naples court, where Alessandro was preferred to other Neapolitan contenders) and imprisoned in the convent of S Antoniello. (Two months later the Duchess of Maddaloni secured the release of the 'canterine' from the viceroy.) Neither Anna Maria nor Melchiorra is named in Neapolitan opera librettos or theatrical documents; Walker (MR, xii, 1951) supposed the protagonist of the Roman and Neapolitan scandals to have been Melchiorra, but professional singing is documented only for Anna Maria.

Anna Maria's husband Paolo Massonio joined the imperial army and died in Hungary, fighting against the Turks, in 1687. In 1699 Anna Maria married the Neapolitan shipowner Nicola Barbapiccola, who later became impresario of the Teatro S Bartolomeo in Naples and staged (7) Domenico Scarlatti's first operas; their daughter Giuseppina Eleonora (b 1700) was an amateur musician and a pupil of Jommelli. In her will, written after her first husband's death and under the influence of Melchiorra and Melchiorra's husband Nicola Pagano, Anna Maria authorized Alessandro to take charge of her two children and her effects. The will later caused a difficult lawsuit.

(3) Melchiorra Brigida Scarlatti (b Palermo, 5 Oct 1663; d Naples, 2 Dec 1736). Sister of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti. She went to Rome in June 1672. It is not clear whether she was involved in the scandals in Rome and Naples referred to above (see (2) Anna Maria). Since there are no references to her as a professional singer, she may not have been 'la Scarlati' who became the mistress of Giovanni de Leone, secretary of justice to the viceroy, by whose influence Alessandro was appointed maestro of the royal chapel in February 1684. In 1688 she married Nicola Pagano (1659–1722), a double bass player at the royal chapel. In May 1708 her husband rented the Teatro dei Fiorentini for six years, but was so unsuccessful that his financial supporters replaced him in 1709 and appointed another impresario.

(4) Francesco (Antonio Nicola) Scarlatti (b Palermo, 5 Dec 1666; d Dublin, ?after Jan 1741). Composer, brother of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti. He went to Naples some time in 1672–4, where he studied at one of the conservatories. On 17 February 1684 he became violinist at the royal court, at the same time that his brother Alessandro was appointed maestro di cappella. In 1690 he married Rosolina Albano, who bore him at least five children; she died in Palermo on 29 June 1706. In February 1691 Scarlatti was granted permission to go to Sicily, where he remained for at least 24 years. In an application, dated 29 June 1715, for the position of assistant Kapellmeister to Emperor Charles VI he stated that he had been maestro di cappella in Palermo for 26 years. This was not at the royal chapel, but that he was working in Palermo as a professional musician is shown by his inclusion in the membership lists of the city's Unione dei Musici in January and July 1694. In 1703 a 'dialogo a cinque voci', La profetessa guerriera, was performed at the Convento dell'Immacolata Concezione, Palermo, and two Latin oratorios were performed at the oratory of the Arciconfraternita del SS Crocifisso, Rome, in 1699 and 1710. A dialect comedy, Lo Petracchio scremmetore, was given in Aversa, near Naples, in 1711, in collaboration with his brother-in-law Nicola Pagano. A Dixit Dominus and a mass, both for 16 voices and instruments, together with a chamber cantata, Belle pupille care, and a serenata, Il nuovo sole, for the birthday of Charles VI date from the Palermo period. A fourth oratorio, Daniele nel lago de' leoni, and a Laetatus sum for five voices and strings may also date from this period. Despite the full support of the Kapellmeister, J.J. Fux, Scarlatti's application in 1715 for the post of vice-Kapellmeister at the Viennese court was unsuccessful, even though he claimed to have lost his position in Palermo because of his Austrian sympathies. His Miserere in G minor was probably composed to support his application.

Scarlatti returned to the Italian mainland; in February 1719 he drew a salary in respect of his much earlier post at Naples. The same year he travelled to London, perhaps on the invitation of Handel or Geminiani; his name appears in a number of concert advertisements between 1719 and 1724. In January 1720 he was offered, but seems to have rejected, a position at Cannons. The marriage register of S Giovanni in Porta, Naples, shows Francesco Scarlatti as having died by the time his daughter Eleonora married Alessandro Binda there on 12 July 1726 (see Prota-Giurleo, Archivi, xxvii (1960), 371) – an incorrect statement perhaps fuelled by some family dispute over his remarriage. By 1733 he had moved to Dublin, probably on the recommendation of Thomas Roseingrave or Matthew Dubourg. A disclaimer in Faulkners Dublin Journal (11–14 August 1733) stating that 'Jane Scarlatti . . . hath eloped from her said Husband' is the only indication that he remarried. A benefit concert for Scarlatti, 'who, thro' a long Confinement by Sickness, is reduced to very distressful Circumstances', was advertised in January/February 1741. It is likely that he died soon after.

(5) Tommaso Scarlatti (b ?Palermo, 1669–72; d Naples, 1 Aug 1760). Tenor, brother of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti. He went to Naples at such an early age that he later knew nothing of his infancy in Sicily. He was apparently trained at the Conservatorio S Onofrio. On his marriage certificate (30 May 1701) he declared that he had never left Naples, but this detail conflicts with his presence in Crema at the beginning of the same year, when he was described as 'virtuoso del duca di S Pietro' and sang the principal role in Il furio Camillo (the dedication on the libretto is dated 22 January 1701) and in L'innocenza giustificata. In 1703 he sang in his nephew Domenico's Giustino in Naples. At the beginning of his career he played serious roles, but later specialized as a buffo tenor, contributing to the establishment of a Neapolitan version of an old ingredient of Venetian opera. Sartori (RMI, xlvi, 1942) considered Tommaso Scarlatti a key person in the first season of Neapolitan opera buffa, when he appeared as a dim-witted, deformed servant in Li vecchie cofiejate and as an old woman gardener in Le fenzejune abbentorate (1710), and again as an old woman in La Cianna (1711); he also suggested that Nicola Orilia and Michele Falco may have written for him the part of Ciccuzza, the elderly pedlar and villain who, in Lo Lollo Pisciaportelle, takes every opportunity to sing, in Sicilian, the praises of Palermo and to insult Naples. Further appearances are documented in 1736, 1737 and 1740; from 1722 he was employed at the royal chapel. The opera singer Rosa Scarlatti (b Naples, 5 May 1716), who appeared in Venice in 1747 and later in Vienna, may be his daughter, and the composer (8) Giuseppe Scarlatti may possibly be his son of that name (b Naples, 18 June 1723).

(6) Pietro Filippo Scarlatti (b Rome, 5 Jan 1679; d Naples, 22 Feb 1750). Composer, son of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti. He probably received his earliest musical training from his father. From 1705 to 1708 he was maestro di cappella at Urbino Cathedral, a position he left when his father summoned him to Naples in the expectation that he would succeed Cristoforo Caresana as first organist of the royal chapel, a post which had been promised him by the viceroy, Cardinal Grimaldi. But Grimaldi was mortally ill by the time Scarlatti arrived in Naples, and he died (in November 1710) before his promise could be fulfilled; Scarlatti had then to wait until 1712 to succeed Giuseppe Vignola as one of the royal chapel's organists. Not until 1728 did he receive his first commission for an opera, Clitarco – probably the only one he wrote. Burney reported that Cotumaccio had called him 'good for nothing'. He had three children (Domenico, Alessandro and Anna); one, Alessandro, must have been a musician because after Pietro's death the children petitioned (unsuccessfully) that their late father's position should be given to him.

(7) (Giuseppe) Domenico Scarlatti (b Naples, 26 Oct 1685; d Madrid, 23 July 1757). Composer and harpsichordist, sixth child of (1) Alessandro Scarlatti and Antonia Anzaloni. He never used his first Christian name (which could have led to confusion with his nephew Giuseppe): his name is always given in Italy as Domenico (or the familiar Mimo) Scarlatti, and in Portugal and Spain as Domingo Escarlate (Escarlati or Escarlatti).

1. LIFE.

(i) Apprenticeship. There is no specific information on Domenico Scarlatti's introduction to music. In so large a family of musicians, his uncle Francesco and brother Pietro, if not his father, would soon have noticed and nurtured his special gifts; biographers have speculated that he finished his musical education under Gaetano Greco or Bernardo Pasquini. Burney states that while Alessandro was living in Naples he entrusted Domenico to Francesco Gasparini in Rome (BurneyH, ii, 635), but Kirkpatrick suggests that Burney's chronology is confused and attributes greater importance to Domenico's contact with Gasparini in Venice between 1705 and 1709, when he was more experienced. In any case, the young man's precocious talent had already blossomed: when he was only 15 his father had arranged for his appointment as organist and composer of the Cappella Reale in Naples, with a special additional payment for the post of clavicembalista di camera, suggesting that Domenico's particular talent was already evident. When in 1702 Alessandro went to Florence, he chose to take his son, intending that this would seal Domenico's relationship with Ferdinando de' Medici. At the end of the period of leave allowed by the Spanish viceroy, Alessandro sent Domenico back to Naples alone, but if he had meant him to take over the position he himself had relinquished, then he miscalculated, as Domenico had insufficient experience and the opera season for which he was responsible was not a success.

(ii) The young eagle. A letter from Alessandro to Ferdinando de' Medici, dated 30 May 1705, is informative and gives a fair picture of the subordinate position in which this authoritarian father continued to keep his son: 'I have forcibly removed him from Naples where, though there was room for his talent, his talent was not for such a place. I am removing him also from Rome, because Rome has no shelter for music, which lives here as a beggar'. The rest of the letter contains a straightforward assessment of Domenico's talent: 'an eagle whose wings are grown; he must not remain idle in the nest, and I must not hinder his flight'. The young man was sent to Venice, 'escorted only by his own ability', and his father wrote that, in his judgment, 'he has advanced much since he shared with me the honour of serving Your Highness personally, three years ago'. There is a clear indication of Alessandro's hopes for a position in Florence when he writes: 'He goes, like a wayfarer, to meet every opportunity that may present itself for him to become known, and which is awaited in vain in Rome today'. The granprincipe (heir to the grand duke) replied that

4. Domenico Scarlatti: portrait by Domingo Antonio de Velasco, c1740 (Casa-Museu José Relvas, Alpiarça)

Domenico had 'truly such a wealth of talent and spirit as to be able to secure his fortune anywhere, but especially in Venice, where ability meets with every esteem and favour', and confined himself to recommending Domenico to a Venetian patrician.

It is surprising that so few traces have survived of Domenico's activities in Venice; all that remains are two unsupported anecdotes, one of which ties in with another eloquent account of his remarkable skill on the harpsichord. Handel's biographer Mainwaring refers to a competition promoted by Cardinal Ottoboni to compare Scarlatti's keyboard skills with those of Handel, who had recently arrived in Rome: Scarlatti recognized his rival's superior ability on the organ, while listeners were divided on the outcome of the harpsichord competition. The two musicians were on excellent terms and long continued to demonstrate mutual esteem – in his biography, Mainwaring attributed to Handel a fine picture of Scarlatti the man ('besides his great talents as an artist, he had the sweetest temper, and the genteelest behaviour'). Mainwaring also recounts a meeting between the two young composers in Venice, during Carnival: '[Handel] was discovered there at a Masquerade, while he was playing on a harpsichord in his visor. Scarlatti happened to be there, and affirmed that it could be no one but the famous Saxon, or the devil'. This anecdote anticipates a series of similar legends about Paganini, Liszt and other virtuosos reputed to have entered into a pact with the devil; it was not just one but a thousand devils that Roseingrave later evoked when he told Burney about his first encounter with Scarlatti, to describe the effect on him of the astounding virtuosity displayed by the severe-looking young man who followed him at the harpsichord.

In 1707 Scarlatti witnessed his father's failure in Venice; this may have raised doubts as to the wisdom of his father's self-promotional strategy. As far as is known, there was no immediate reaction, and the son dutifully kept to his father's way of working; but Alessandro's plans allowed no room for Domenico to develop his vocation for the harpsichord, which had already been so clearly demonstrated.

(iii) High professionalism. A comparison of the early sources suggests that Domenico Scarlatti's career was less static than his biographers have painted, particularly in the years before he took on his most important positions in Rome: maestro di cappella to Maria Casimira, the exiled former Queen of Poland, and assistant and then later successor to the head of the Cappella Giulia. Alessandro's plan of detachment from his son's career had failed in Naples but in Rome it was successful beyond expectation; the Queen of Poland – Alessandro had described himself as in her service when in 1708 he composed Il trionfo della fede – employed Domenico as her maestro di cappella, after giving him the oratorio La conversione di Clodoveo and the pastoral La Silvia to compose, both to librettos by C.S. Capece, a member of the Arcadian Academy who served as her secretary. This marked the beginning of a close collaboration, guaranteeing that the operas, which Maria Casimira had staged in a small theatre in a room in her palace, and the serenatas, performed in summer on a bridge across the Strada Felice joining Palazzo Zuccari to the palace opposite, were generally along the same lines. Some of the credit for their success belongs with Filippo Juvarra, who designed the sets: with inventive use of perspective he overcame the site's narrow dimensions which would otherwise have made it impossible to create operatic marvels of the kind that audiences were accustomed to see in the stagecraft of the great theatres. Even if there were considerable differences of style and quality between his father's supposed models and Scarlatti's known work (as Boyd has pointed out), the duties of maestro di cappella to an exiled queen meant that Alessandro's experiences under Christina of Sweden were repeated, with rather more consistent application.

When, on 19 November 1713, Paolo Lorenzani, director of the Cappella Giulia at S Pietro, died, he was succeeded by his assistant Tommaso Baj, and Scarlatti was appointed to Baj's post and when, on 22 December 1714, Baj died, Scarlatti took his place as maestro di cappella. This guaranteed income came at a fortunate moment, as financial ruin had obliged Maria Casimira to leave Rome and take refuge in France. Scarlatti's early, Neapolitan works may include sacred music, and he had composed sacred pieces for the Basilica Liberiana when his father was its maestro; this new, important post led him to intensify his work in this direction. The original Stabat mater for ten voices is usually assigned to this period and is recognized as his most significant contribution to sacred polyphony.

The direction of the Cappella Giulia imposed heavy demands on Scarlatti but did not exhaust his capacity for work. June 1714 saw the beginnings of his relationship with the Marquis de Fontes, the Portuguese ambassador, for whom he composed an Applauso genetliaco in celebration of the birth of one of the Portuguese infantes. This first connection with a Portuguese patron led, five years later, to Scarlatti's move to Lisbon. At the same time Scarlatti did not neglect opera: when he lost his position with the Queen of Poland, he continued to have his operas staged at the Teatro Capranica, where his father's last operas were being staged at just the same time.

Alessandro's declaration that he would not impede 'the eagle's flight' is consistent with a strange document from 1717 in which he conceded, apparently with some reluctance, his son's independence from paternal authority. Clearly, important changes were pending: on 3 September 1719 an entry in the Vatican Diario declares that 'as Sig. Scarlatti maestro di cappella in St Peter's has departed for England, Sig. Ottavio Pitoni, formerly at St John Lateran, is appointed maestro'. It has never been established whether he did in fact intend to travel to London, or indeed whether he actually went; Francesco Scarlatti had been there since April of that year, and it should be noted that both Handel and Roseingrave were active there. On 30 May 1720 Narciso, a new version of Amor d'un'ombra e gelosia d'un'aura, modified and conducted by Roseingrave, was performed in London; had Scarlatti been there, he would surely have been involved in the performance.

(iv) Lisbon. While a visit to England remains a vague possibility, Scarlatti knew when he left Rome that London would not be his final destination. It is now known, from documents discovered and published by Gerhard Doderer, that he was impatiently awaited in Portugal, where João V had appointed him mestre of the royal chapel. He arrived in Lisbon on 29 November 1719 to a great welcome: not content with having 'demonstrated his skill' to the sovereigns several times, he sang at court accompanied by the queen herself. Lisbon promised only a more lucrative continuation of the Roman routine, although there were no regular performances of opera; but fulfilling work as a teacher awaited the new mestre de capela and after various notices of his successful early appearances Scarlatti was asked to take charge of the completion of the musical education of João's brother Don Antonio.

In Lisbon, Scarlatti was impressed with the talent of Carlos Seixas, whom Don Antonio had suggested as a pupil. Portuguese legend holds that Scarlatti recognized the young man, then 16, as his superior; however improbable that may be, it is likely that it was Seixas who set him on a new path, the combination of elements of art and folk music. Meanwhile, another royal pupil was showing exceptional musical talent: Maria Barbara, who later, as Queen of Spain, was an indulgent and generous protectress and patron of Scarlatti, was beginning to 'surprise the amazed intelligence of the most excellent Professors with her Mastery of Singing, Playing and Composition'.

Now, besides having to compose sacred works or revive ones already given in Rome, Scarlatti had the extra pleasure of composing harpsichord pieces in the service of Maria Barbara and Don Alfonso. This raises the issue of the chronology of the sonatas, and it may be appropriate here to bring into question the widely accepted rejection of Kirkpatrick's 'approximately chronological' theories. When Scarlatti arrived in Lisbon he had more than sacred music in his baggage: in addition there were almost certainly some 50 keyboard pieces that had been written or sketched before he left Italy. There was no opera in Lisbon, but there were performances of sacred works and serenatas (some composed by Astorga) for celebrations of royal birthdays or namedays. A notice in the Gazeta di Lisboa in 1722 and a Vatican document attribute the title of 'Abbate' to Scarlatti; this was apparently in connection with an ecclesiastical benefice and has no further historical significance.

The accounts studied by Doderer make no reference to Scarlatti's presence in Lisbon between the end of December 1719 and 24 June 1720; and on 16 April 1720 a musician called Dominicus Scarlatti is listed as present in Palermo at a meeting of the Unione dei musici di S Cecilia. This may simply be another musician of the same name; but the complex relationship between Scarlatti and Emanuele d'Astorga, another Sicilian composer of cantatas and serenatas who was soon to move to Lisbon, suggests otherwise. Astorga held important civic posts in Palermo and may have encouraged Scarlatti to visit the land of his forebears. 'Dominicus' was at another meeting of the Unione in Palermo on 9 December 1722. The two dates are not incompatible with records of Scarlatti's presence in Lisbon (as shown by Doderer), and other contemporary accounts (by Quantz and Hasse) confirm his presence in Rome and Naples in 1724 and 1725 in spite of his obligations as mestre of the Portuguese royal chapel. Further, he returned to Italy at the end of January 1727 (as a document discovered by Doderer shows):

> Sig. Domenico Scarlatti M.ro di Cappella of his Majesty the King left here for Rome, to restore his health with the benefit of that air, since he has not been able to recover from his indispositions, his Majesty having provided him with 1000 scudi for the journey, for the esteem in which he holds his qualities.

This discovery confirms the notice of a reimbursement of the costs of a journey cited by Walther on the basis of a reference in no.122 of the Hallische Zeitungen, no longer traceable. It has been suggested (by Clark, after Walker) that Scarlatti was continuously on the move between 1719 and 1728.

It is uncertain whether Scarlatti returned to Lisbon after being cured; but he was almost certainly present at the performance of the Festeggio armonico that he composed in celebration of the betrothal of his pupil Maria Barbara to Ferdinando, the Spanish infante, on 11 January 1728. The wedding itself took place a year later, on 19 January 1729, in a pavilion specially built on the Rive Caya to allow both João V and Philip V to attend without setting foot on foreign soil; it is not certain that Scarlatti attended this second celebration, but he had been in Rome on 15 May 1728 when he married the 16-year-old Maria Catalina Gentili. Possibly he returned to Portugal soon after that; the dedication to João of his Essercizi indicates that it was by his royal command that Scarlatti was allowed to follow his pupil to her new country.

(v) Spain. The systematic moves of the Spanish court round the principal cities of the kingdom have been detailed by Kirkpatrick and, following the various stages of this itinerary, Clark has tried to isolate the folk elements in some of the sonatas that reflect the 'tunes sung by the carriers, muleteers, and common people' to which Scarlatti, a southern Italian, must have been susceptible. The curtailment of his duties, now that he was no longer mestre de capela to the Portuguese court, sparked a profound change in his activities: happy to be freed from that routine, he now became involved in the highly cultivated, private entertainments that Ferdinando and Maria Barbara held in their apartments, sheltered from the jealousy and resentment of Elisabetta Farnese, Philip V's second wife. One of those taking part in these entertainments was Farinelli, risking losing the favour of the queen who had brought him to Spain and had succeeded, through the great singer's virtuosity, in her intention of rousing Philip V from his lethargy and depression. Farinelli's presence may have been the stimulus for the cantatas which Boyd assigns to Scarlatti's maturity.

Shortly after moving to Spain, Scarlatti had returned at least once to Lisbon; a manuscript diary indicates that the 'musician Scarlatti' was accompanied by 'his lovely wife and two children' and that he continued to receive his large salary. The 'Abbate Scarlatti' image was vanquished, and the term 'musico' less than ever implied 'castrato': in 19 months of marriage the 'hermosa' Catalina had given her mature husband two children. She had six altogether, and died on 6 May 1739; after a brief period as a widower Scarlatti married Anastasia Ximenes, a young woman from Cádiz who between 1743 and 1749 gave birth to a further four children, giving Domenico parity with his father's progeny. If this represents rivalry with the ghost of Alessandro, on a musical level the younger Scarlatti's prolific output of sonatas corresponded in number and quality to the older composer's cantatas.

In 1738, the publication of a collection of 30 Essercizi brought Domenico Scarlatti's sonatas a Europe-wide circulation. A token of gratitude to João V, who had appointed him a Knight of the Order of Santiago, the volume is prefaced by a conventionally eulogistic dedication: the contrast between the laudatory hyperbole and the subsequent note to the reader is striking:

> Do not expect, whether you are an amateur or a professional, to find any profound intention in these compositions, but rather an ingenious jesting with art by means of which you may attain freedom in harpsichord playing. It was not self-interest or ambition which led me to publish them, but obedience. Perhaps they may please you, in which case I may more willingly obey further commands to gratify you in a simpler and more varied style.

The publication, given official standing by its dedication to the king, had been preceded by preparatory work in Paris which led to later issues. In London, Roseingrave, seeing his role as Scarlatti's alter ego in jeopardy, immediately printed a pirate edition which added to the Essercizi 12 pieces which apparently dated from the period when he had met the composer in Italy. Avison took the unusual course of complementing some of the pieces from Roseingrave's collection with others also by Scarlatti, apparently in his possession, in orchestral versions as 12 concertos. Even if all the evidence suggests that the Essercizi turned out to 'please', the promised publications 'in a simpler and more varied style' never appeared; none of the subsequent publication ventures seems to have been guided by the composer.

In 1746, when the death of Philip V saw Ferdinando and Maria Barbara accede to the throne, Farinelli's influence led them to find a place for opera, which could count on the personal connections of the darling of the opera stage as well as powerful support from Vienna of Metastasio, who was an intimate friend of Farinelli's. Scarlatti, however, was not invited to return to opera composition and the last part of his life seems to have been spent on the immense task of overseeing the compilation of the double series of manuscripts in which form his collected sonatas have come down to us. In the volumes copied between 1752 and 1757 the use of the number 30, on an almost systematic basis (repeating the formula of the Essercizi), suggests the existence of some planned publishing scheme, abandoned on the deaths of the composer and his royal patrons. One charming legend has this work as the happy consequence of Scarlatti's known weakness for gambling: the queen and Farinelli (who told Burney that he helped his friend in similar predicaments) are supposed to have offered the money to pay off the composer's debts in exchange for written copies of the sonatas which Scarlatti had largely improvised in the princely apartments. The survival of the treasure that has come down to us in the royal manuscripts, inherited by Farinelli on Maria Barbara's death, would thus be due to another, special act of 'obedience'.

The impression of Scarlatti's final years is of a contrast between a striking show of vitality which saw him continue to father children up to the (for the period) advanced age of 64, and a creative mood of introspection which produced the final polished versions of the sonatas that constitute his legacy. It is tempting to imagine that it might have been Antonio Soler (a monk in the Escorial and a pupil of Scarlatti's in precisely the years 1752–7) who compiled the volumes and assisted the composer. The single autograph letter which has survived, written to the Duke of Huescar in 1752, matches this twilight mood: as well as complaints about 'theatrical composers' who knew nothing of counterpoint yet received such praise, the letter courteously contrasts Scarlatti's health, which prevents him from leaving his house, with that of his noble addressee, 'great, strong and magnanimous, and full of health', betraying a poignant serenity in keeping with the impression of an elderly composer weighing up a lifetime's experience. This sense of detachment from the world also has a suitably religious aspect, and there is a beautiful manuscript from 1754 (copied out with extreme care to make the calligraphy match that of models from the past) of a Missa quattuor vocum which shows Scarlatti adhering scrupulously to the old style neglected by the opera composers. If 1754 is the year of its composition, the significance of this attractive piece is as a proud demonstration of a specific skill, and any contradiction with the almost contemporary Salve regina for soprano, strings and continuo, which beautifully sums up the synthesis of contrapuntal learning and melodic and harmonic practice at the basis of Scarlatti's technique, is only apparent. Almost all the manuscript sources of the piece describe it as 'the last work of Dom.co Scarlatti made in Madrid shortly before his death', but other 'swansongs', covering most of the century, from Pergolesi to Mozart, may have suggested such a legend, which nevertheless is stylistically plausible. The indication on a manuscript of the last series of pieces in the collection similarly reads: 'last sonatas for harpsichord by D. Scarlatti composed in 1756 and 1757, the year in which he died'.

In his penultimate year, Scarlatti had received a visit from Dr L'Augier, a friendly Viennese doctor who travelled to hear the 'national melody in all parts of the world with philosophical ears'; Burney took down his testimony, which the doctor considered 'a living history of modern music'. Scarlatti gave a warm welcome to his guest, who was better placed than anyone to appreciate the introduction into the sonatas of 'many passages ... in which he imitated the melody of tunes sung by carriers, muleteers, and common people'. The 'sweetest temper' and 'genteelest behaviour' which Handel attributed to his colleague characterize the recorded conversations, even when the arguments grew heated. Scarlatti was outspoken in his criticism of the 'cembalo music' by certain contemporary composers as not uniquely appropriate to the harpsichord. His insistence in defending his own artistic work, which he knew was open to criticism, is significant:

> Scarlatti frequently told M. L'Augier, that he was sensible he had broke through all the rules of composition in his lessons; but asked if his deviations from these rules offended the ear? and, upon being answered in the negative, he said, that he thought there was scarce any other rule, worth the attention of a man of genius, than that of not displeasing the only sense of which music is the object.

The contradiction with the reprimand for 'modern theatrical composers' is only apparent: similar arguments should be related to the sort of superiority complex that had led Alessandro Scarlatti to compose 'inhuman' music which he deliberately made inaccessible to 'any Professor'. For all the differences in their human approaches, both father and son agreed with Horace that 'Non cuivis homini contigit adire Corinthum' – 'not everyone deserves to get into Corinth'.

2. INSTRUMENTAL WORKS. Any discussion of Domenico Scarlatti's instrumental output must focus on his keyboard sonatas: not only because of the pre-eminence of the Essercizi and sonatas in his work but because even in their most developed form these pieces relate to a single stylistic model, identified by Ralph Kirkpatrick as the basso continuo. The practice of improvising an accompaniment on a bass line was a stock-in-trade of every professional musician; in the case of Scarlatti, a keyboard player of astounding virtuosity and immense creativity, the habit of condensing, of translating contrapuntal implications into harmonic structures, meant that routine formulas were gradually left behind.

Such a statement cannot be justified without reference to the principal manuscript sources which, with the Essercizi, have preserved the corpus of Scarlatti's work for posterity. This is a double sequence of volumes which Farinelli inherited from the Queen of Spain, in the compilation of which the composer must have been involved during his final years. Two volumes, bound like the 13 to be described below, were compiled in 1742 and 1749. The Spanish and Portuguese coats of arms, stamped on the cover of the binding of these collections and the subsequent ones (now in I-Vnm) indicate that they were intended for Queen Maria Barbara in person.

(i) Venice 1742. The volume dated 1742, which probably contains only sonatas composed before Scarlatti moved to Portugal, arranges the material in no discernible order but immediately establishes the formal model, used in every separate piece, which Scarlatti continued to follow almost invariably: this, broadly, is a binary structure with repeats, typically linked to the dance suite. The volume opens with 15 pieces stylistically fairly close to the Essercizi; then a Fuga is followed by some less sophisticated, and less quintessentially Scarlattian sonatas. These include genuine remnants from some suites: a Gavota, a Capriccio, a Gigha and Scarlatti's only known set of variations. There are also what are clearly transcriptions of polyphonic motets (K69, 87), of 'Italian concertos' (K37) or reminiscences of his father's toccata style (K67, 72). The influence of violin style looms large, something which the composer apparently assimilated during his Venice years; these are among those keyboard pieces inspired by other existing instrumental (or vocal) styles, which led Bukofzer to speak of 'transfer'. The most developed of them see the introduction of procedures (crossed hands, acrobatic leaps) that Scarlatti used fairly systematically in his mature harpsichord music. It would be inappropriate to refer simply to 'transfer' in the case of the numerous sonatas in more than one movement presented as 'melody and bass' which can be, and were intended to be, performed by more than one instrument. In this case the texts retain unmistakable violin references.

The contradiction inherent in the titling of the volume which promises exclusively 'Sonate per cembalo' is only apparent: performance on harpsichord alone is still possible, as is demonstrated by other sonatas (the Capriccio K63 and particularly the Gavota K64) created in the spirit of basso continuo but then overloaded by the overt notation of chords – very different from Scarlatti's later ideas, as a mature composer, when he arrived at a characteristic keyboard style. Curiously, the volume contains five of the Essercizi although these pieces had been available in printed form for four years.

(ii) Pairwise arrangement. Some of the sonatas in this volume follow the archaic scheme whereby the principal piece is followed by a short minuet; it is possible to see here the germ of a conception that later underwent considerable development in the internal organization of the subsequent collections, beginning with that of 1749. Here the Sonata K100 displays an odd structure: at the end of an Allegro, which has all the characteristics of an independent Scarlatti sonata, the indication 'volti subito' introduces an Allegrissimo with identical characteristics: these would be two distinct sonatas were it not that the composer demonstrated unambiguously his intention to group them together, instructing the copyist to give the pairing a single number (3) within the volume. Kirkpatrick gave each piece a separate number in his catalogue (K99 and 100), justifying his decision by the separate appearance of the sonatas in other sources. This explicit pairing anticipates the principle later adopted, Kirkpatrick's 'pairwise arrangement', whereby most of the sonatas subsequently copied were grouped into 192 pairs and four groups of three. Contrasting or complementary elements lie behind the groupings: often a cantabile or demonstrably rhythmic sonata is followed by a brilliant one, and the major mode may follow the minor (always with the same tonic). Even when, in subsequent volumes, some pairs seem to be formed from the juxtaposition of stylistically dissimilar elements, the overall intention to group the pieces – which the copyist cannot have conceived and carried out without the composer's consent – holds true. It seems that Scarlatti was influenced by the contemporary circulation of harpsichord sonatas in two or three movements – those by Alberti, for instance, with which he was certainly familiar. The new volume shows an emphasis on virtuosity and justifies Kirkpatrick's term 'flamboyant' to describe the style of these sonatas.

(iii) Venice: 'Los trece libros'. Between 1752 and 1757 a single amanuensis assembled, from sketches or originals that are now lost, no fewer than 28 beautifully copied volumes. This was the period during which a monk in the Escorial was a pupil of Scarlatti's; Soler's references to copying the composer's work and to the 'trece libros de clavicordio' add strength to the hypothesis that he himself was the copyist (the more likely in that one of his biographers praises Soler's diligence and tirelessness, attributes essential to carrying out so demanding a task). These 13 volumes, with the two previous, unnumbered ones, make, together with a copy of the Essercizi, the corpus of the Venetian manuscripts; the fact that they were intended for Maria Barbara implies that their internal organization is definitive.

The reference to Maria Barbara and Ferdinando prompts the suggestion that the prevalence of undemanding sonatas in the first two volumes is explained by their having been written for teaching purposes at the highest level. The third and fourth present a splendid assortment of sonatas whose perfect balance between musical sophistication and virtuoso demands reveals Scarlatti's stylistic maturity. Here more than ever is that 'ingenious jesting with art' to which Scarlatti referred in the preface to his Essercizi: a game in which the inspired composer and his excellent pupil are equal partners. The following three volumes may reveal a step backwards in terms of quality, a return to more elementary dimensions and educational concerns, hinting at the arrival of a less gifted pupil (perhaps Ferdinando). The eighth volume heralds what Kirkpatrick called 'the final glorious period'. Given the recourse to sonatas which clear stylistic considerations indicate were composed earlier but were deemed suitable for the creation of groups of two or three, the evident maturity of the final collections does not necessarily support the theory that the sequence in the manuscripts follows the chronology of their composition: the most striking novelties concern the enlarged keyboard (increasing with each new volume, up to the five octaves and a tone of K485, copied in 1756), but the previous versions of some sonatas, in secondary sources, reveal that some originally designed for instruments with a more limited range were inserted, in versions adapted in the light of new possibilities.

(iv) Parma. The other series of 15 volumes (I-PAp) duplicates 444 sonatas in the Venetian manuscripts and provides further pieces not in those collections (including the group of 12 exceptionally beautiful sonatas which come at the end of a secondary manuscript source, with the description 'Last Sonatas for Cembalo by D. Domenico Scarlatti, composed in the year 1756 and 1757, in which he died'). The elimination of the melody and bass sonatas and of pieces judged too close to the archaic practice of ambiguous instrumentation shows that some filtering had been carried out on the contents of the 1742 and 1749 volumes; the omission of the last sonatas is motivated by the desire not to compromise the standard 30 pieces per volume, which makes the trece libros a perfect sequel to the Essercizi.

(v) The 'clavicordio'. Both the Venice and Parma manuscripts specify a 'cembalo', and every Spanish reference to a 'clavicordio' generates confusion, given the ambiguity of this term, which could indicate equally the clavichord proper or the harpsichord ('clavicordio de plumas'), or even Cristofori's instrument ('clavicordio de piano'). Since the surviving evidence links Scarlatti's miraculous playing to the harpsichord, not to the clavichord nor the Florentine 'arpicembalo che fa il piano e il forte', it is appropriate to consider Scarlatti's keyboard music as written principally for the harpsichord. When he specifically intended the organ (K287 and 288), the manuscript is absolutely clear about the type of instrument ('da camera', with two manuals, 'Flautato' and 'Trombone'), and the pieces abandon the customary binary structure. There are other keyboard instruments on which the sonatas can be played, so reflecting the variety of choices characteristic of a much more casual approach than fanatics of historical performance would allow. The clavichord, which was fairly commonly found throughout Spain, can render the cantabile qualities of some Adagios effectively but robs almost all the Allegros of their vivacity. Scarlatti was familiar with the 'clavicordio de piano' and in Florence as early as 1702 and 1705 had been able to try out the prototypes that Bartolomeo Cristofori built for Ferdinando de' Medici; he certainly played the other model, which the Tuscan prince had presented to Cardinal Ottoboni. Don Antonio of Braganza, the uncle of Maria Barbara and a pupil of Scarlatti in Lisbon, had travelled in Italy in 1714 and was the dedicatee of the 12 Sonate da cimbalo di piano e forte detto volgarmente di martelletti by Ludovico Giustini, the first sonatas published specifically for the instrument. Three 'Clavicordios de piano, echos en Florencia' appear in the queen's inventory of instruments (the fact that two of them had been transformed into harpsichords has given rise to a variety of theories). For all its limited volume, Cristofori's instrument met and overcame the lack of colour in the harpsichord of which Maria Barbara had complained. In any case, it is known that Scarlatti used hammer-action instruments in Portugal and Spain, and this must be taken into account. It is going too far to transform the greatest harpsichordist in history into 'the piano's greatest advocate' (D. Sutherland, EMc, xxiii (1995), 243–56); and all the more so since the discovery of a detailed inventory of Farinelli's instruments has brought to light one that sensationally prefigures the Grand Pleyel beloved of Wanda Landowska. This was probably the famous 'Cembalo expresso' ('expressivo'?) for which Scarlatti wrote the pair of sonatas K356 and 357, written on four staves and included in the Parma but not the Venice collections.

The inventory attached to Farinelli's will clarifies which and how many 'various devices' were capable of forming 'different series of sounds' on an instrument which Giovenale Sacchi, his biographer, described in vague terms. The document confirms that the harpsichord was 'invented by the maker of this will', indicates that it was built in Madrid by Don Diego Fernández and provides details of enormous interest: 'it plays the pianos and fortes with a quill', is 'an eight-foot instrument' and uses 'three types of string, of copper, steel and gut, which play together, separately and mixed, according to the attached plan of its various registers'. All this would be extraordinary enough if it did not also have, hidden in the feet of the legs that support the instrument at each end of the keyboard, springs to engage the registers with ten stops to a pedal so that they can be operated separately or together, with 'movable lead knobs' used to engage one or two registers while the feet are operating the others. The registers are: (1) 4′ [ottavina], full register; (2) Archlute, full register; (3) Left hand harp, half register with gut strings; (4) Left hand 4′, half register; (5) Archlute and 4′, full register; (6) Harp and harpsichord, full register; (7) Harpsichord sounding as flute, full register; (8) Right hand, 4′, half register; (9) Right hand, harp, half register with gut strings; and (10) Harp, full register with gut strings. Sacchi relates that:

> By chance the queen, in talking with Farinelli, mentioned that she would like to have a harpsichord with more various tones [voci], and asked him if he had ever seen such a one. He replied that he had not. But then, leaving the queen without saying anything further, he consulted Fernández, whose talent he knew, and after they had designed the work together and executed it, he arranged for it to be found as a surprise by the queen in her apartments.

This revolutionary instrument was thus the product of a passing dissatisfaction on the part of Maria Barbara and the inspiration of a hugely talented courtier and a great craftsman. If this is the harpsichord finally made 'expressive' by its variety of registers, the devoted Scarlatti would hardly have missed the opportunity to celebrate its invention with a pair of pieces such as these; but the fact that a four-staff layout thereafter disappears from the sources shows that the composer returned to composing and organizing his work for his own harpsichord, one with an ever larger range but solidly anchored to the standard sound. It was up to the imagination and skill of the performer to reflect, in strictly idiomatic terms, allusions, ranging from the obvious ones to the guitar and certain fanfares that he imaginatively idealized, but also draw together musical references to Christmas melodies that, as a child, Scarlatti had heard Neapolitan bagpipers play. So, while Cristofori's and Fernández's instruments remain legitimate and interesting options, Scarlatti's sound world is firmly rooted in the instrument on which the young virtuoso had called up the thousand devils which so astounded Roseingrave, and which now allowed the aging maestro to interpret the songs of Iberian muleteers and carriers in the variety of approaches that give the sonatas their exceptional vitality.

The part played by melody in Scarlatti's keyboard interests is marginal, given the prevalence of harmonic and rhythmic ideas in his harpsichord music. The internal structure of the sonatas is a confirmation of what is almost disavowal of melody, paradoxical for a Neapolitan but enormously significant for a composer for whom the harpsichord held no secrets. It is misleading to focus on the role of thematic elements when analysing the sonatas: Scarlatti's approach is based rather on following the conventional harmonic span of each binary piece. This was implicit in Kirkpatrick's shift of interest towards the variety of accessory elements in the sonatas, in which he proposed a distinction between the 'closed sonata (in which both halves begin with the same thematic material)' and the 'open sonata (in which the thematic material that opens the first half is not used to open the second)'. It is significant that his principal new idea was a form of abstraction, linked more closely with tonal polarity than with the pedantic enumeration of 'themes'; this was the 'crux', which Kirkpatrick defined as 'the meeting point in each half of the thematic material which is stated in parallel fashion at the ends of both halves with the establishment of the closing tonality'.

The unconventional aspect invoked by Scarlatti in his conversations with L'Augier should not be ascribed solely to the surprising effects scattered like spices in the texture of the sonatas but also to the fact that so many openings, seemingly promising thematic development, give way immediately to as many 'original and happy freaks', based principally on lively rhythmic ambiguities and harmonic manipulations (including those acciaccaturas for which von Bülow implied a Shakespearean reference when he invoked 'a madness not without method'). There was in Scarlatti a sort of manic obsession which can be linked to the Christian parable of the talents. As L'Augier told Burney:

He used to say, that the music of Alberti, and of several other modern composers, did not, in the execution, want a harpsichord, as it might be equally well, or perhaps, better expressed by any other instrument; but, as nature had given him ten fingers, and, as his instrument had employment for them all, he saw no reason why he should not use them.

There is an implicit criticism here of transcriptions of music not idiomatically suited to the harpsichord's capabilities. In 1756 the compilation of the manuscripts was almost complete, and Scarlatti could look with a certain detachment at the 'transfers' of his youth, even if possibly some instrumental transcriptions of vocal music in the pathetic style and elegantly decorated (K208, for example) escaped his censure. Now song and melody were reserved for voices, and the composition of his gentle Salve regina in the same year confirms such a decision. When the harpsichord reclaims its melodic rights it comes in the incipits of some of the mature sonatas (K544, 546), but the charm lasts only a few bars: soon harmonic dialectic takes over and fingerwork fills the space left empty by Alberti and his imitators.

3. VOCAL WORKS. Scarlatti's first opportunity to engage in opera came with the appointment of his uncle, Nicola Barbapiccola, as impresario of the Teatro S Bartolomeo, Naples, for the 1703–4 season, when the young composer was called upon to provide three operas, one of them an extensive revision of Pollarolo's Irene. His main contribution to the genre, however, was made with the seven operas he composed for Queen Maria Casimira in Rome between 1710 and 1714, of which two survive complete in their original form and a third in the version produced (as Narciso) in London in 1720. Too often dismissed as pale imitations of his father's operas, they show several quite original traits coupled with a keen dramatic sense. In ensembles, for instance, the individual lines are often distributed in an easy, conversational style, and the prescribed da capo is sometimes jettisoned in the interests of natural expression. In the arias it is not uncommon for a character's indecision or conflicting emotions to be conveyed through frequent changes of tempo and dynamics (and sometimes of instrumentation). Some arias are designated alla francese, and in others the voice is doubled throughout at the unison or octave with no other accompaniment – a Venetian trait rarely, if ever, to be found in Alessandro Scarlatti's works. The satirical farce La Dirindina, intended as intermezzos for one of the two public operas that Domenico wrote for Rome, is also unlike anything ever attempted by the elder Scarlatti.

Scarlatti seems not to have been employed as an opera composer after leaving Rome in 1719, although he evidently continued to take an interest in the genre and occupied his own box at Farinelli's productions for the Spanish court. His interest in vocal composition did not, however, come to an end with his appointment as music-master to Princess Maria Barbara in Lisbon. Of the several serenatas he composed for the Portuguese court (and before that for his Italian patrons), only two survive, both incomplete, but Contesa delle stagioni especially, written to celebrate the birthday of Queen Marianna on 7 September 1720, contains some of his finest, and grandest, writing for voices and instruments.

The chamber cantata, of which just over 50 fully authenticated examples by Scarlatti survive, was another genre which he cultivated with considerable success. Those he wrote in Italy (most of them probably in Rome) are mainly accomplished, though conventional, examples of the type of solo cantata in which his father had excelled.

5. King Ferdinand VI, Queen Maria Barbara and the Spanish royal household: engraving by Charles-Joseph Flipart after Jacopo Amigoni, 1752; Domenico Scarlatti and Farinelli can be seen in the musician's gallery on the right

Of more interest are two manuscripts (in A-Wn and GB-Lbl) containing in all 18 cantatas dating almost certainly from Scarlatti's Iberian years; some at least may have been sung by Farinelli at the Spanish court. They show Scarlatti adopting many features – predominantly major keys, a slow rate of harmonic change, numerous written ornaments (particularly the slide) and Lombardic rhythms – associated with operas by such composers as Conforto, Hasse and Jommelli that were performed at the court.

It is difficult to arrive at even an approximate chronology for Scarlatti's church music. Only a single work, the expressive Salve regina for soprano, strings and continuo composed during the composer's last year, is dated in the sources, but this is quite probably for private devotions rather than a church composition. Most, if not all, of the other sacred pieces were presumably written during those periods between 1708 and 1728 when Scarlatti was employed as a church musician. Among the earliest, perhaps, are four works that have remained in the archive of S Maria Maggiore ever since Scarlatti wrote them in 1708–9. The antiphon Cibavit nos Dominus, possibly intended for the feast of Corpus Christi in 1708, is one of Scarlatti's most successful stile antico pieces; other works in this style include a four-part mass which may have been Scarlatti's contribution to the re-stocking of the royal palace library in Madrid after the fire of 1734. Also among the S Maria Maggiore works is a mass, La stella, notable for its stylistic dichotomy; the Credo and subsequent sections again exemplify the stile antico, while the Kyrie and Gloria employ a kind of stile misto that Scarlatti used to even greater effect in the best-known of all his sacred works, the Stabat mater for ten voices and continuo.

It should occasion no surprise that Scarlatti's vocal music shows little of the harmonic daring and few of the 'happy freaks' that characterize his mature harpsichord sonatas. The keyboard music of this period – Scarlatti's perhaps more than most – sprang directly from the composer's fingers in the act of improvising. Vocal composition, on the other hand, was essentially a considered art, subject to the demands of a text and governed by the rules and traditions of 'good composition'. The apparent gulf between Scarlatti's vocal and keyboard styles can be observed also in the music of other composers such as Byrd and Frescobaldi.

4. Reception. Scarlatti's sonatas were circulated irregularly and only in part during their composer's lifetime. In England, Roseingrave and others laid the foundations for what Newton later described as the 'English Cult of Domenico Scarlatti', a phenomenon that developed after the Essercizi, Roseingrave's response and Avison's transcriptions had been published, and music which had had a halo of myth and which later in the century was performed and valued by Kelway, Worgan and Clementi, and imitated by Arne, Avison, William Jackson and others, began to be disseminated. But the earliest publishing ventures with Scarlatti's sonatas were in Paris, and it was there that the Essercizi were reprinted, together with other sonatas, one of which (K95) is unique to Boivin's edition. Apart from these indisputable signs of interest, there is no information as to how the French public reacted to Scarlatti, but it must have come as a shock to open a volume of Pièces choisies pour le clavecin ou l'orgue and discover music so different from that by Dandrieu, Dornel, Daquin or Corrette, to which keyboard players of the generation after Couperin and Rameau were accustomed.

Although it has been said that there was no Italian Scarlatti cult, Abbé Santini was able to acquire copies of hundreds of the sonatas and introduce famous pianists to them, including Cramer and Liszt; these musicians took great pleasure in reading old music direct from manuscript at the home of the Roman collector – 'especially pieces by Domenico Scarlatti, whose "Cat's Fugue", such an original and unusual masterpiece, was always one of the favourite pieces of that select and intelligent band of listeners'. As a result, some knowledge of Scarlatti's music and his style spread through the Italian musical world, of which evidence can be found in references made by such musicians as Rossini and Verdi.

In the first decades of the new century, it was Vienna that saw ventures destined to bring about a fuller knowledge of Scarlatti's work. The collection of the diplomat Joseph DuBeine included about 100 Scarlatti sonatas, distributed in various volumes which on his death in 1814 were auctioned and acquired by Archduke Rudolph, Beethoven's pupil par excellence. Between 1803 and 1807 eight volumes of sonatas were printed, partly from DuBeine's collection. Clementi, a leading figure in the 'English Cult of Domenico Scarlatti', was regularly in Vienna at that period in his capacity as music dealer; he seems to have been responsible for inventing the story of the 'Cat's Fugue' (K30), according to which the unusual theme came from a kitten's random steps up the keyboard. It was also in Vienna, in 1839, that the publisher Haslinger and his pupil Czerny completed the publication of as many as 200 sonatas.

In Germany, knowledge of Scarlatti's music may have been encouraged more by the circulation of foreign publications than by that of the VI Sonate per il cembalo solo published by Haffner about 1753. Did Bach know Scarlatti's music? Assumptions that two pieces by Bach were derived from Scarlatti models were ruled out by Kirkpatrick, but it has been suggested that the Goldberg Variations, 30 in number, are a response to the 30 Essercizi; Bach may well have encountered the publication or one of its reprints (it is worth remembering that the term Clavier-Übung, used by several composers before Bach, is the equivalent of Essercizi per il gravicembalo). Other German musicians demonstrated their admiration for Scarlatti: Quantz, who met him in Rome in 1724, had been amazed by the perfection of his playing, and Hasse remembered for Burney, half a century later, 'a wonderful hand, as well as fecundity of invention', when he heard him in Naples, on a visit to his elderly father. Scarlatti found no favour with two important exponents of German Romanticism: Mendelssohn took offence at an observation by Rossini after hearing one of his Charakteristische Stücke: 'Ça sent la sonate de Scarlatti!' Schumann repeated a remark by a 'brilliant composer' (Mendelssohn?) that compared with the most gifted German composers Scarlatti was 'like a dwarf among the giants'. There is nationalism in the opposite direction in a letter from Verdi to Ricordi (November 1864): after bemoaning the exclusion of 'the so-called Cat's Fugue' from the Scarlatti items in an anthology of old music: 'with so strange a subject a German would have created chaos, but an Italian made something as clear as the sun'. Hans von Bülow prepared an edition of 18 sonatas, but in comparing Scarlatti with Bach ruled that he was 'not a genius but a talent of great significance'; he illustrates the reasons that led him to eliminate the acciaccaturas, which he thought created cacophony on the piano and offended the eye and ear (precisely the freedoms of which Scarlatti boasted to L'Augier), and he also retouched many 'harmonic errors'. Nevertheless, von Bülow paradoxically recognized Scarlatti's role as a precursor of Beethoven, since with him 'humour and irony set foot for the first time in the realm of sound'. Brahms collected Scarlatti manuscripts and studied the sonatas in depth: some passages in the Second Piano Concerto seem to be influenced by the demanding K299, and the quotation of K273 as the incipit of the song Unüberwindlich is a clear act of homage.

As for the Iberian peninsula, the manuscripts studied by Boyd and Doderer make it clear that the sonatas were not used exclusively by the composer's royal pupils; the existence of Spanish copies which assign to the organ pieces far from the austere idiom normally connected with the instrument reveals an unusual and unexpected circulation of the composer's legacy.

A decisive step in bringing about a proper knowledge of Scarlatti's work was taken at the beginning of the 20th century with the publication by Ricordi of all the sonatas then known (545 of the 555 pieces later catalogued by Kirkpatrick). This was done by Alessandro Longo, who took account of the Venetian sources, some of the early editions and certain of the Viennese manuscripts, but not the parallel series of manuscripts now in Parma (whose existence was unknown) nor a pair of important volumes in England. Longo's work is certainly dated; its principal defects derive from insufficient knowledge of stylistic issues and matters of instrumental technique and performing practice. Further, he followed his own whims in regrouping the pieces into arbitrary 'suites' according to key. The credit for re-establishing certain characteristics of the texts goes to Walter Gerstenberg, who in 1933 carried out a rigorous comparison of the principal sources, although he neglected to give sufficient emphasis to the grouping into twos and threes, which his own scrupulous cataloguing had brought to light. Ralph Kirkpatrick's study (1953) was the fruit of ten years of careful research, added to the practical experience of an illustrious harpsichordist. Thanks to Kirkpatrick, Scarlatti ceased to be an eccentric, late product of the Baroque need for 'marvels' and his music received the kind of critical attention which would see Schumann's unjust verdict set aside.

A new chronological ordering, realized through a regrouping of the sonatas by genre, was proposed by Giorgio Pestelli (1967), whose contribution had considerable value in establishing an appropriate historic and stylistic context for Scarlatti. From 1970 the writings of Joel Sheveloff have enlivened the critical debate with interventions of remarkable polemical force and exemplary attention to detail, with a perceptive interpretation of the sources. The most telling contribution using Spanish sources has come from Malcolm Boyd, who has also provided a determined, well-documented re-evaluation of the composer's vocal music. Gerhard Doderer's contributions are concerned primarily with the documentation of biographical data regarding Scarlatti's time in Portugal, and also information on the instruments Scarlatti favoured.

The critical editions of the sonatas which Kirkpatrick hoped for are now a reality. Kenneth Gilbert was responsible for completing the first (Paris, 1971–84), with a concise, balanced preface that focussed on the interpretation of the sources. 1978 saw the beginning of a new Ricordi critical edition, under Emilia Fadini, characterized by a more accurate graphical reflection of the sources and a critical system based on detailed comparisons. The Venetian manuscripts are accessible to scholars in a facsimile edition (1985), as are the Essercizi (1967, 1977).

(8) Giuseppe Scarlatti (b Naples, ?1718, or 18 June 1723; d Vienna, 17 Aug 1777). Composer. His date of birth and precise relationship to the other Scarlattis are uncertain. A Giuseppe was born in Naples in June 1723 to (1) Alessandro's brother (5) Tommaso; another Giuseppe, born in 1718, was a nephew of (7) Domenico, according to Burney. Since one of Giuseppe Scarlatti's earliest works, the oratorio La SS Vergine annunziata, was performed in Rome in 1739, 1718 would seem to be the more likely date. Although in the libretto of the oratorio he is called 'Maestro di Cappella Napolitano', there is no record of his holding such an appointment and the title is presumably honorific.

According to the locations of his opera premières, Scarlatti seems to have been active in a number of different cities. He composed for Rome (1739–41); for Florence, Pisa, Lucca and Turin (1741–9); for Venice (1752–4); for Naples (1755); for Venice again (1756–9, and in 1756 for Milan); and for Vienna (1759–72, with performances at Turin in 1763 and at Verona in 1765). Since L'impostore, on which he probably collaborated with Gioacchino Cocchi, was performed at Barcelona in 1752, it is possible that the performance was connected with Domenico Scarlatti's sojourn in Spain.

The first of Scarlatti's two marriages was to Barbara Stabili, who sang buffa roles in Vienna and elsewhere; she apparently died in or about 1753. Between 1757 (or 1759) and his death Scarlatti himself seems to have been active in Vienna as composer, harpsichordist, and music teacher to members of Prince Schwarzenberg's family. Up to 1772 a number of his stage works were performed at the Burgtheater, including a festa teatrale, Armida, to a libretto by Marco Coltellini, whose intermezzo Dove è amore è gelosia was also set to music by Scarlatti in 1768, and the opera Amiti e Ontario, to a libretto by Calzabigi. Up to 1764 Scarlatti enjoyed the protection of Count Durazzo and Gluck, both very influential figures at the Viennese court. By 1767 he had married Antonia Lefebvre, who that year bore him a son. She died three years later, and Scarlatti himself died intestate in 1777.

Scarlatti composed over 30 operas, 21 of which were of the seria type and 11 of the buffo type. He set at least nine librettos by Metastasio and several by Goldoni. It is doubtful whether he composed the music for a fifth Goldoni libretto, Il mercato di Malmantile, which is attributed to him in the libretto for a performance of the opera in Venice in Carnival 1758. Another libretto citing the same performance date, location, cast and printer attributes the music to Domenico Fischietti.

Giuseppe Scarlatti carried on the lyrical melodic tradition established by Alessandro and Domenico Scarlatti before him, creating in the process a charming but simple style in which the orchestra for the most part functioned as accompaniment to the vocal parts. Judging by the few repeat performances of some of his operas (such as I portentosi effetti della Madre Natura) very few achieved much success. He had a talent, however, for depicting slapstick elements in his comic operas, as evidenced in the mock Chinese scene in Act 2 of L'isola disabitata. Since so few of his opere serie survive, it is difficult to identify his achievements in that genre.

Scarmolin, Anthony Louis (b Schio, 30 July 1890; d Wyckoff, NJ, 13 July 1969). American composer, conductor, pianist and teacher of Italian birth. He studied at the New York German Conservatory of Music (diploma 1907). In 1909 when a debilitating hand condition frustrated his aspirations as a concert pianist, he began to focus on composition. Naturalized as an American citizen in 1911, he served in the US Army during World War I. Upon his return from Europe, he became a supervisor of instrumental music in the Union City, New Jersey, public schools (1919–49). He remained active as a composer, conductor and pianist throughout his life.

Among the most striking aspects of Scarmolin's compositional style are the forward-looking hyperchromaticism and tonal ambiguity of many of his early works (1904–9); a representative example from this period is his dramatic Piano Quintet 'Una lotta col destino' (1907). After 1909 he adopted a more conservative approach, writing in genres that either appealed to the public, or could be used for pedagogical purposes. Many of his compositions for concert use attributes of his earlier, avant-garde style, albeit refined by greater conformity to traditional harmony and form. After 1937 he increasingly composed for instrumental ensembles. Primarily a melodist, he incorporated lengthy chromatic passages, tritones, whole-tone scales, tertian elements and occasional orientalism in his writing. A prolific and versatile composer, Scarmolin wrote seven operas, over 200 choral works, more than 100 songs, nearly 550 works for keyboard, over 70 pieces for chamber ensemble and almost 150 compositions for orchestra.

HELEN BENHAM

Scarselli, Rinieri [Riniero; Raynero de Scarsellis] (b Bologna; d after 1 Aug 1642). Italian composer. He was a priest and a canon regular of S Salvatore, Bologna. As a musician he was a pupil of Galeazzo Sabbatini, two of whose compositions, one of them a mass, he included in his earliest publication, Sacrarum modulationum ... liber primus (Venice, 1637), for two to four voices and organ. By 1640 at the latest he had become a member of the Accademia dei Filomusi in Bologna, as is clear from the title-page of his Primo libro de' madrigali op.2, for two to four voices (Venice, 1640; only the bass part survives). His other surviving publication is Cantate ... commode da cantarsi in diversi strumenti (Venice, 1642) for accompanied solo voice. This contains three laments, which according to Fortune are on the whole rather dull; the most interesting is a lament of Andromeda, Ahi! dolore, which contains some expressive recitative and a triple-time aria section built on a passacaglia bass. The volume also includes 11 strophic arias, some of which, such as Amo bellezza and A gran torto fere amate, are in a madrigalian style. A further publication, Il primo libro de' madrigali (Venice, 1642), for five voices, is cited by Fétis but is otherwise unknown.

Scat singing. A technique of jazz singing in which onomatopoeic or nonsense syllables are sung to improvised melodies. Some writers have traced scat singing back to the practice, common in West African musics, of translating percussion patterns into vocal lines by assigning syllables to characteristic rhythms. However, since this allows little scope for melodic improvisation, and since the earliest recorded examples of jazz scat singing involved the free invention of rhythm, melody and syllables, it is more likely that the technique of scat singing originated in the USA as singers imitated the sounds of jazz instrumentalists.

Scat singing was one of the 'novelty' devices of early New Orleans jazz; it can also be heard in undeveloped form on some early blues and washboard-band recordings. The most celebrated early instances are by Louis Armstrong, whose highly successful recording Heebie Jeebies (1926, OK) established his reputation as a jazz singer; his early scat solos rival his trumpet improvisations in virtuosity, range of feeling and variety of attacks and timbres (see ex.1, which clearly imitates a trumpet 'rip').

insts tacent rip da du da du da du-ya da da dit dip bah!

Armstrong started a vogue for scat singing, which was soon popularized by singers such as Cab Calloway, whose many scat solos in the 1930s served as a model for the 'citified' black music of Sportin' Life in Gershwin's Porgy and Bess.

As jazz improvisation grew increasingly complex, scat singing followed suit, with the result that later scat singers could improvise effortlessly in the complex bop idiom. Ella Fitzgerald in particular made a speciality of imitating various jazz instruments and even particular soloists, thereby greatly expanding the range of timbres and attacks in scat singing (ex.2). Other important scat singers in the bop style included Eddie Jefferson, Betty Carter, Anita O'Day, Joe Carroll, Sarah Vaughan, Carmen McRae, Jon Hendricks, Babs Gonzales and the trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie. Like other jazz musicians, each scat singer adopted a unique, immediately recognizable timbre and delivery, and developed a personal stock of syllables and vocal devices. The trumpeter Clark Terry's distinctive 'mumbling' technique and Gillespie's imitations of trumpet smears are extreme but not untypical examples. Bop scat singing was also vitiated and popularized, mainly by Ward Swingle and the Swingle Singers, whose application of scat techniques to the classical repertory arose originally from a desire to find new solfège exercises for classically trained singers. In addition, the usefulness of bop scat singing for teaching jazz was discovered, notably by Lennie Tristano, and accounts for the relatively large number of scat singing manuals that are in fact primers in jazz improvisation and ear training.

The free-jazz movement of the 1960s saw a vast expansion of the timbres and resources available to scat singers, and the international spread of scat singing to other types of music. The Chicago singer Leon Thomas incorporated pygmy yodelling techniques of Central Africa into his singing, while many scat singers (including Karin Krog from Norway, Urszula Dudziak from Poland and Flora Purim from Brazil) came to jazz from other musical cultures. The extension of vocal improvisation to include sounds formerly regarded as non-musical, such as cries, screams, sobbing and laughter, was one of the principal innovations of this period, and at times brought jazz singing close to avant-garde art music, as is apparent for example in the work of Cleo Laine in Britain or, later, Lauren Newton in Vienna and West Germany. Dudziak in particular explored the possibilities of electronic manipulation and distortion of the voice.

With the bop revival in the mid-1970s there was also a revival of interest in bop scat singing, leading to comebacks for singers such as Betty Carter and Eddie Jefferson who had previously worked in obscurity. Many young scat singers regarded themselves as belonging to the classic bop tradition; among the best of these was Al Jarreau, who is particularly adept at creating vocal equivalents of complex jazz-rock rhythms, and Bobby McFerrin, whose extraordinarily wide range and mobility are evident in his unaccompanied solo performances. Contemporary scat singers have shown that this vocal art can strike out in directions of its own, independent of developments in instrumental jazz or avant-garde music.

Scelsi, Giacinto (b La Spezia, 8 Jan 1905; d Rome, 9 Aug 1988). Italian composer. Scelsi's extraordinary life encompassed many aspects of the intellectual, spiritual, social and musical life of the 20th century. He was born into southern Italian aristocracy, inheriting the title Count D'Alaya Valva, and as a young man travelled extensively, moving within Europe's most elevated social circles. His English wife, Dorothy (whose nickname 'Ty' figures in the titles of two of Scelsi's works) was a distant relative of the British royal family; their wedding reception was held at Buckingham Palace. His music attracted a number of prestigious performances, particularly in Paris where Pierre Monteux conducted the première of Rotative in 1930. During World War II he lived in Switzerland; after the war his wife returned to England, never to contact him again. He spent the latter part of his life in Rome, where his apartment overlooked the Forum.

Much of the detail of Scelsi's life is shrouded in mystery, something he himself did much to encourage. It seems, however, that after some initial successes as a composer, he suffered a devastating mental breakdown between the composition of La nascita del verbo (1947–8) and the Suite no.8 'Bot-ba' (1952). Scelsi's early compositional career had been a progression through some of the principal aesthetic tendencies of 20th-century music – futurism, neo-classicism, dodecaphony, surrealism – preoccupations fed variously by periods of private study with Respighi and pupils of Skryabin and Schoenberg, and by his friendships with Henri Michaux, Pierre Jean Jouve, Paul Eluard and Salvador Dalí. The later works reveal a new preoccupation with an obsessive reiteration of individual sounds, a legacy of the lengthy period of rehabilitation from his illness. Scelsi described how he would spend days repeatedly playing single notes on the piano, developing a new, intensely focussed mode of listening. The multi-movement form of many subsequent pieces can also be heard as an extension of this reiterative exploration – sequences of movements are intended not to provide contrast but to offer a repeated re-examination of the same sound object.

Although Scelsi's music continued to attract occasional performances in the 1950s and 60s, his career was eclipsed by the emerging Italian composers of the post-war period, and his compositional concerns, as far as they were known, were regarded as of marginal interest. It was not until the 1970s that the significance of his work began to be recognized by a new generation. Younger composers, including the American Alvin Curran, the Prix de Rome guests Grisey and Murail, and the Romanian exile

Radulescu, discovered in Scelsi's work aspects of the musical world which interested them, struck particularly by the concentration on gradual timbral transformations.

At the beginning of the 1960s many avant-garde composers had begun to explore the inner life of sounds, writing music which focussed on small fluctuations within sustained sonic bands. What distinguished Scelsi's work from Ligeti or Cerha's scores of the period was the profound subjectivity of Scelsi's engagement with his material, an engagement in which abstraction seemed to play no part. In his most wholly characteristic works pitch, timbre, register and dynamics are heard as the inherent expressive potentialities of each sound, rather than as separate parameters to be controlled more or less independently. The Quattro pezzi (su una nota sola) (1959), for example, use microtonal pitch inflection, timbral transformation and rhythmic reiterations to animate the 'note' on which each movement is based, stretching its identity far beyond that of a mere frequency.

Subsequent works explore this plasticity of sound yet further, drawing a handful of musical strands out of an initial tone and allowing them to diverge. Usually such divergence covers an interval of no more than a third, but it makes possible a beguilingly unpredictable harmonic architecture in works of the mid-1960s such as Ohoi (1966) and the Fourth String Quartet (1964), arguably Scelsi's finest music. Inevitably, given his microscopic examination of instrumental sound, intervals derived from the harmonic series predominate. His intuitively composed work can therefore be heard to anticipate later, more systematic developments: not only the 'spectral' music of the Itinéraire group but also the exploration of the pitch-timbre continuum in computer music.

As word about this extraordinary, neglected music spread, performances and then recordings began to multiply. The critic Harry Halbreich was a persuasive advocate; promoters such as Adrian Jack at the Institute of Contemporary Arts in London, Wolfgang Becker at WDR and Ernstalbrecht Stiebler at Hessische Rundfunk organized portrait concerts of Scelsi's work. The Arditti Quartet took up the string quartets, Marianne Schroeder and Yvar Mikhashoff the piano music, and conductors such as Jürg Wyttenbach the orchestral works. This period of rediscovery culminated in the mid-1980s with belated first performances of many of Scelsi's largest scores, and triumphantly acclaimed presentations of Scelsi's work during the 1986 Holland Festival and the 1987 ISCM World Music Days in Cologne.

The spiritual world of Scelsi's mature works is rooted in an exotic mix of pantheism and theosophy, derived from Gurdjieff, Blavatsky and Sri Aurobindo, but also stimulated by Scelsi's own visits to India and Nepal. Scelsi saw his work as straddling the aesthetic worlds of East and West, using the instrumental resources of the West in music whose meditative focus on individual tones has obvious links to both the monastic traditions of Tibetan Buddhism and the ison principle of Byzantine Orthodox worship. Elsewhere, particularly in the works of the late 1950s, there are elements of arabesque reminiscent of the folk music of the eastern Mediterranean. Scelsi claimed that 'Rome is the boundary between East and West. South of Rome the East begins, and north of Rome the West begins. This borderline runs exactly over the Forum Romanum. It runs right here, through my drawing-room'. His titles offer further evidence: Aiôn (1961) is subtitled 'Four Episodes in a day of Brahma', Anahit (1965) is 'A Lyric Poem dedicated to Venus', Pwyll (1954) is a Welsh druidic term, while the title of Konx-om-pax (1969) brings together the ancient Assyrian, Sanskrit and Latin words for 'peace'.

Scelsi's approach to composition was itself hybrid: for him music was not a communicative medium but something immanent, revealed through the creative process. His reluctance to describe his working methods as 'composing' stemmed from the belief that music passed through him; it was not something 'put together' by him. Indeed the working method of his mature years was unusual, depending primarily on the selective transcription of improvisations made in a quasi-meditative state. He would perform these improvisations generally at the keyboard, either the piano or, in later years, the Ondiola, a three-octave electronic instrument with a rotary attachment for producing microtonal inflections. Scelsi would also invite performing musicians who showed a particular affinity for his work to improvise for him, painstakingly refining their instrumental resources for the sound-world he wanted, so that works such as the Canti del capricorno (1962–72) or the cello Trilogy (1956–65) became intimately associated with their first interpreters, the singer Michiko Hirayama and the cellist Frances-Marie Uitti.

Each improvisation was recorded (the process of cataloguing the tapes was begun after Scelsi's death) and the most successful improvisations were then transcribed and realized as instrumental scores. Exceptionally, some improvisations were used more than once: the Fifth String Quartet (1984) and the amplified piano work Aitsi (1974) are both transcriptions of the same tape. The actual writing of the scores was undertaken by an assistant, working under Scelsi's direction. After Scelsi's death his most frequent collaborator, Vieri Tosatti, revealed the extent of his involvement in the making of Scelsi's scores, claiming that he had worked with Scelsi since 1947 and had written out all his major works since then. The discovery that Scelsi was not the sole author of his scores has troubled some critics who, associating it with his lack of a conventional compositional apprenticeship, have accused him of dilettantism, even of a sort of artistic fraud. Scelsi's collaborative approach was, however, consistent with his compositional philosophy, as was his reluctance to make public appearances at performances of his work, and his refusal to be photographed. By the time of his death his music had achieved an eminence which its composer resolutely rejected for himself.

Scena (It.; Fr. scène; Ger. Szene, formerly Scene). The word is derived from the Latin scaena, which in turn comes from the Greek skēnē, 'tent', 'hut', 'booth' and hence 'stage', 'décor'. It is used in opera, as in drama generally, to mean (1) the stage (e.g. 'sulla scena', on the stage; 'derrière la scène', behind the stage), (2) the scene represented on the stage, (3) a division of an act.

In Italian opera it also has the specific meaning of an episode which has no formal construction but may be made up of diverse elements. The opening of Act 3 of Verdi's Ernani (1844) is described as 'Preludio, Scena e Cavatina'. The 'Preludio' is for orchestra. The 'Scena' consists of recitative for the king, with interpolations by his squire. A scena is frequently more extended than this and includes, in addition to recitative, arioso passages and one or more arias, duets, etc. A scena of a particularly dramatic character, often (though not invariably) for a single character, is described as a 'gran scena', e.g. 'Gran scena del sonnambulismo', the sleep-walking scene in Verdi's Macbeth (1847, rev. 1865). The word was also used to describe a setting for concert performance of a scene from an opera libretto, e.g. Mozart's Misera, dove son K369 (1781), for soprano and orchestra, the text of which is taken from Metastasio's Ezio. Spohr's Violin Concerto in A minor op.47 (1816) is subtitled 'In modo di scena cantante'. In French and German opera 'scène' and 'Szene' are used much like 'scena', but generally to describe quite short sections of a work, e.g. no.11 bis in Act 2 of Bizet's La jolie fille de Perth (1867), which is an accompanied recitative for the duke and Mab.

Schaal, Richard (b Dortmund, 3 Dec 1922). German musicologist. He studied musicology at Marburg University, where he took the doctorate in 1946 with a dissertation on Hugo Kaun. He supplemented his studies with private tuition in music theory with Hans Gebhard, and conducting with Waltershausen; he also completed an advanced degree in library sciences at the Bayerische Staatsbibliothek institute, Munich, in 1956 . He was the music consultant for the Bavarian radio (1962–86) and editor of the series Quellenkataloge zur Musikgeschichte, the Taschenbücher zur Musikwissenschaft and the Veröffentlichungen zur Musikforschung; he also wrote over 130 articles for Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart (1949–68). Schaal specializes in compiling bibliographies of source materials (manuscripts, prints, inventories and archival collections) for localized music research of the 16th to 19th centuries; he also compiles lexicographies and bibliographies designed for library use and he has written on the life of Mozart and the history of music publishing.

Schaathun, Asbjørn (b 22 June 1961). Norwegian composer. He was educated at the Norges Musikkhøgskole in Oslo and the Royal College of Music in London. Early on in his compositional career he tried to redefine modernism through his music by extending traditional, complex 'modern' elements into larger structures, combining them with an active musicianship. He founded the Oslo Sinfonietta to give a platform to performances of contemporary music, and led the ensemble for many years. He also works as a teacher and is a steady contributor to music magazines. He has had a lasting relationship with the IRCAM centre in Paris and has received commissions both from the centre and other important performing institutions; his prizes include the Gaudeamus Foundation's Louis Vuitton prize in 1991.

Schachinger [Schächinger, Schechinger], Johann [Hans] [the elder] (b Passau, 1485; d ?Munich, ?1558). German organist and composer. He studied with Paul Hofhaimer in Passau from 1502 to 1506, and his contemporaries considered him one of Hofhaimer's most important pupils. In 1506 he took a post as organist in Schwaz in the Tyrol; he was later appointed court organist to Duke Wilhelm IV in Munich, probably through the intercession of Wilhelm's brother, a member of the chapter in Passau. The first reference to him in Munich is in 1531, and by 1557 he was held in such high regard that he had become the highest-paid member of the court chapel. His capabilities as an organ builder were greatly prized. Schachinger (called 'the elder' to distinguish him from his son Hans, organist in Innsbruck 1541–9 and mentioned in the chapel archives from 1551 to 1564) probably died in 1558, because that year a new organist was appointed to the Munich court, and in 1561 Schachinger's widow was granted a pension.

12 four-voice lieder with the initials 'J.S.' in Formschneider's collection of songs by Heinrich Finck (RISM 1536[9]) are undoubtedly Schachinger's. In all except one the cantus firmus appears in the tenor. The works show all the typical formal and melodic characteristics of the 16th-century court song; although their standard varies some are of excellent workmanship, and the discant setting Ach hülf mich Leid (ed. in Eitner) is outstanding. The folksong setting Es wollt ein Maidlein Wasser holn (ed. in EDM, lx, 1969) was attributed to Schachinger by his contemporaries Egenolff (1535[11]) and Forster (1540[21]), but Johann Ott and several manuscript sources ascribe the work to Ludwig Senfl, whose style of composition it clearly resembles.

KURT GUDEWILL/R

Schacht, Matthias Henriksen (b Visby, Gotland, 29 April 1660; d Kerteminde, Fyn, 8 Aug 1700). Danish scholar, writer on music, musician and composer. Since the Swedish island of Gotland was under Danish occupation when he was ready to begin his university studies in 1678, he went to the University of Copenhagen. He continued his education at various German universities before in 1682 he was given an appointment at his former school at Visby. The following year the famous Danish bishop Thomas Kingo called him to Odense grammar school as Kantor, and in 1686 he was made rector of the school at Kerteminde. There he served also as town musician and carried on scholarly investigations into a wide range of subjects, including castles in Hungary, the topography of Gotland, zoology, botany, mathematics and history. He published papers on learned Danish women and on antiquities on the island of Fyn – in connection with which he set up a kind of museum – but very little of his work appeared in print. Among the manuscripts that he left at his early death was one on music entitled Musicus danicus eller Danske sangmester, completed on 1 January 1687 (in DK-Kk; ed. G. Skjerne, Copenhagen, 1928). This work, whose four parts cover singing, theory, composition and playing from thoroughbass respectively, is of particular interest for the fact that it begins with a biographical dictionary of musicians, the first known attempt at such a work. It was known to E.L. Gerber, who used it in the preparation of his own Tonkünstler-Lexicon (1790–92), but his theory that Schacht drew on a lost work by Meibom is without foundation. Schacht was also a composer, but none of his music has survived.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Schacht, Theodor, Freiherr von (b Strasbourg, 1748; d Regensburg, 20 June 1823). German composer. From 1756 to 1766 he studied the piano and theory with J.J. Küffner and Riepel at the Thurn and Taxis court in Regensburg, and from 1766 to 1771 he was a pupil of Jommelli at Stuttgart. In 1771 he became a Hofkavalier to Prince Carl Anselm of Thurn and Taxis, who in 1773 appointed him Intendant of the court's music and commissioned him to set up an Italian opera, which flourished from 1774 to 1778. After the building of a German theatre in 1778 Schacht dedicated himself more to the service of the court. Between 1784 and 1786 he again established an Italian opera at the court, and was its leader and Kapellmeister. From 1786 he was the administrator and musical director of the court orchestra. In 1805 he travelled via Salzburg to Vienna, where he won respect as a composer of sacred music. There in 1809 he was asked by Napoleon to compose six solemn masses, and also enjoyed the protection of Archduke Rudolf. He returned to Germany in 1812, lived in the castle at Scheer (near Sigmaringen) until 1819 and spent his last years in Regensburg.

Schacht's output includes about 200 works, the strongest of which are the theatre pieces in which he cultivated the Italian style of opera. Schacht's church music displays the same theatrical energy, with rich coloratura, homophonic choral movements and a sparing use of fugal sections. His instrumental music was notable less for contrapuntal interest than for its wealth of attractive melodies and harmonies. One of his symphonies was formerly attributed to Haydn (H I:Es12).

Schack [Cziak, Schak, Žák, Ziak], Benedikt (Emanuel) (b Mirotice, 7 Feb 1758; d Munich, 10 Dec 1826). Austrian tenor, composer and flautist of Bohemian origin. He acquired a basic musical and general education from his father, a school teacher, and later studied at Staré Sedlo, Svatá Hora and (from 1773) Prague, where he was a chorister at the cathedral. From 1775 he studied medicine, philosophy and singing (with Karl Frieberth) in Vienna; while a student he wrote some Singspiele and oratorios. In 1780 he was appointed Kapellmeister to Prince Heinrich von Schönaich-Carolath in Silesia. After two years of irregular employment, mostly in Bohemia, he joined Schikaneder's travelling theatre company in 1786. The company toured extensively in southern Germany and Austria before settling in Vienna in 1789, where Schack became the principal tenor at the Freihaus-Theater auf der Wieden (1789). His fame as a composer was based on the series of Schikaneder's seven 'Anton' Singspiele, mostly written in collaboration with F.X. Gerl. He was a close friend of Mozart, who composed (or assisted with) certain numbers for Schack's theatrical scores (notably the duet 'Nun liebes Weibchen' K625/592*a* for Der Stein der Weisen). Mozart also wrote piano variations (K613) on Schack's air 'Ein Weib ist das herrlichste Ding auf der Welt' from Die verdeckten Sachen. Schack performed a wide variety of roles: the part of Tamino was written for him (it is to be presumed that he also played Tamino's flute solos), and he was the first German-language Don Gonsalvo (Don Ottavio) and Count Almaviva (Vienna, 1792); he also took the soprano part in an impromptu sing-through of the unfinished Requiem at the composer's bedside on the eve of Mozart's death. His wife Elisabeth (née Weinhold) sang the part of the Third Lady in the première of Die Zauberflöte.

In 1793 Schack moved to Graz and in 1796 to Munich, where he was a member of the Hoftheater until about 1813, when he lost his voice and was pensioned. His daughter Antonie (1784–1851) was also a member of the Munich company (1800–06). During his last years he wrote mostly sacred music, including a mass 'with additions by Mozart' (KAnh.C1.02/Anh.235*f*). He died before receiving Constanze Nissen's letter (16 February 1826) asking for help with her husband's biography of Mozart; the letter gives an eloquent if politely exaggerated testimony to the friendship of Schack and Mozart: 'I could think of absolutely no one who knew him better or to whom he was more devoted than you ... Of great and general interest will be what you can instance of Mozart's few compositions in your operas'. F.L. Schröder commented (May 1791) on Schack as a singer in Wranitzky's Oberon: 'Hüon, Schack, a good [braver] tenor, but with an Austrian accent and suburban declamation'. Leopold Mozart was more appreciative in a letter to his daughter (26 May 1786): 'He sings excellently, has a beautiful voice, easy and flexible throat, and beautiful method ... This man sings really very beautifully'.

The discovery in Hamburg in the mid-1990s of a manuscript score of Der Stein der Weisen, with most of the numbers identified with the name of the composer, has led to significant new musical attributions, and to a fine recording of the work (following on from the first performance in modern times, undertaken by Boston Baroque at the IMS conference in 1998).

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Schadaeus [Schadäus, Schade], Abraham (b Senftenberg, Lusatia [now Žamberk, Czech Republic], 1566; d Finsterwalde, Lusatia, 10 Oct 1626). German music editor. He studied at the university at Frankfurt an der Oder from 1584 and probably received a master's degree there. He was appointed a teacher at the Fürstenschule at Meissen in 1588 but because of his active Calvinist leanings was forced to leave the position in 1592. Later that year he became Kantor at the Gymnasium and church of St Petri at Bautzen. After failing to obtain the position of Konrektor there he became Rektor of the grammar school at Speyer in 1603. He was dismissed in 1611 and returned to Upper Lusatia in 1613. After serving for a year as Kantor at Torgau he returned to Bautzen in 1614, now as Konrektor. In 1615 he became Rektor, but he resigned in 1617 and went into retirement at Finsterwalde.

Schadaeus owes his place in music history entirely to his three-part anthology of motets, Promptuarium musicum, intended for school and church use; a fourth part was edited by CASPAR VINCENTIUS (RISM 1617[1]), who also provided a continuo part for the first three parts and performed other functions in connection with the second and third parts. This anthology differs from the Florilegium Portense of Erhard Bodenschatz, and probably influenced the Promptuarium musicum of Johann Donfrid, in being ordered according to the liturgical year and in its emphasis on works 'not yet published in Germany': hence the predominance of music by Italian composers. Of the 43 composers represented in the first part, 33 are Italian, and no fewer than 45 of the 51 in the second part and 52 of the 61 in the third are also Italian. Leoni and Bianciardi are among the most popular composers, but Agazzari, Giovanni Gabrieli, Marenzio, Massaino and Benedetto Pallavicino are all well represented. Few German composers appear: eight in the first part, five in the second and nine in the third. In the first part Vincentius with six works and Walliser with three are the best represented; other Germans – Aichinger, Alexius Neander, Hieronymus Praetorius (with two works) and Uffererii – are only represented in the third part. Monte and Luython are the sole representatives of the Dutch school. The anthology comprises works for five to eight voices. It illustrates the then current trend towards block choral writing, involving double chorus or dialogues between upper and lower voices: no fewer than 36 of its composers were leading exponents of the polychoral style in Italy. That the texts are entirely in Latin also reflects the italianate orientation of the anthology: German motets, which have some place in, for example, the enlarged edition of the first part of Bodenschatz's Florilegium Portense (1618[1]), are totally absent.

OTTO RIEMER

Schädlich, David. See SCHEDLICH, DAVID.

Schaefer, Theodor (b Telč, 23 Jan 1904; d Brno, 19 March 1969). Czech composer and teacher. He studied composition with Kvapil and conducting with Neumann at the Brno Conservatory (1922–6), completing his composition studies in Novák's masterclass in Prague (1926–9). He taught at music schools in Kutná Hora (1930–34) and Brno (1934–40) and then theory and composition at the Brno Conservatory; in 1959 he moved to the Academy, where he was later made professor. During the 1930s and 40s he conducted amateur choirs and orchestras in Kutná Hora and Brno; he continued to take an active part in the musical life of Brno, heading the local branch of the Union of Czechoslovak Composers in the 1960s, and directing the newly established International Music Festival in the same city.

His unpublished theoretical studies show that Schaefer thought deeply about composition. He started out from Novák's traditional techniques, but even in the early 1930s he was beginning to broaden his scope under the influence of the western European avant garde, as the stage piece Julie (1933–4) demonstrates. The text for this work was used by Martinů four years later. Schaefer extended Novák's tonality by employing modes, and towards the end of his life he began to combine modality with serial principles. In instrumental works he used an original form which he termed 'diathema': subjects are conceived as collections of rearrangeable elements, and recapitulation is replaced by a synthesis of the elements in the subjects exposed. This form is used in the Third String Quartet, Diathema for viola and orchestra, Barbar a růže ('The Barbarian and the Rose'), the Rapsodická reportáž as well as the Symphony, which was Schaefer's principal work.

JIŘÍ FUKAČ (text), KAREL STEINMETZ (work-list, bibliography)

Schaeffer [Schäffer], Bogusław (b Lwów, 6 June 1929). Polish composer, theorist and teacher. In Kraków he read musicology with Jachimecki at the university (1949–53) and concurrently studied composition with Malawski at the State Higher School of Music. He was a music critic between 1953 and 1959, but since then has devoted his time primarily to composition and teaching; he taught at the Kraków academy from 1963, and in 1986 he joined the staff of the Salzburg Mozarteum. With the political thaw in Poland in 1956, Schaeffer took the lead in disseminating information on contemporary music from the West in a number of analytical and polemical books and articles on style and technique. Later he published Wstęp do Kompozycji/Introduction to Composition, a comprehensive compendium of procedures, variational techniques and sample scores, often drawn from his own music. As a composer, he rapidly became the most adventurous, not to say fearless Polish proponent of new technical and aesthetic boundaries, particularly with regard to notation and performance practice. After the mid-1970s, following a crisis in his creativity, he combined several careers: as a composer, visual artist and as a writer of wry, surreal plays which have popularized his name in Poland and abroad. He is the recipient of numerous national and international awards.

Schaeffer's compositional ethos stems from his experience of European and American avant-garde music of the 1950s; consequently, he forms a unique figure in postwar Polish music. A prolific composer with over 400 works to his name, he has a tendency to work on several pieces at once, reportedly finding greater interest in the process of composition than in the finished product (Tertium datur, 1958, is even subtitled 'compositional treatise'). His iconoclastic and tenacious experimental style has not always found favour in his native Poland.

Even during his early career there was no consistent stylistic development such as may be observed elsewhere in contemporaneous Polish music. Innovatively abstract and schematic scores like Extrema (1957) were succeeded by neo-classicism and serial writing in Quattro movimenti (1957), while Azione a due (1961), the second string quartet and other works develop a fascinating syntax involving graphic and diagrammatic notation. Best known of the latter group is the single-page score Non-Stop for piano (1960). Its realization may last anything between six minutes and eight hours, and the performer, in a typically humorous gesture, is required to utter syllables forming the composer's name. The première of Non-Stop, given in Kraków by Zygmunt Krauze on the 27 October 1964, marked the first Polish 'happening'.

Schaeffer's ethos necessitates giving greater freedom to the performer, often through use of 'open material'. This all-embracing approach accounts also for his output's wide range of styles and genres; certain works draw on his fascination with jazz, while the movement of sound masses found in Scultura and Experimenta achieve contiguity with the textural experiments of his compatriots. Schaeffer has also made a significant contribution to the development of electronic music in Poland.

It is arguably in the sphere of instrumental theatre (anticipating his later career as a playwright) that Schaeffer has made the greatest impact. In works like TIS MW2 (1963) and the pieces for actors, intuition overrules compositional method, and the hitherto continuous dialectic between idealism and reality reaches a balance that supports improvisational flair as well as existentialist humour. And yet such tensions were the probable cause of the impasse he experienced in 1973. The after-effect of this was mildly old-fashioned, with surprising archaisms in Missa elettronica and with dense sonoristic blocks in Uwertura warszawska ('Warsaw Overture'); but in Congruences II (1980), Voice, Noise, Beuys, Choice (1984) and the Sinfonietta (1996) his work regained its experimental impetus, although here the manner of expression is noticeably more relaxed than in the 1960s, partly because of the prominence given to popular music styles and elements of jazz in his eclectic collages.

ADRIAN THOMAS

Schaeffer [Schäffer, Scheffer], Paul (fl 1617–45). German composer. The title-pages of his surviving prints indicate that between 1617 and 1620 he was an instrumentalist among the municipal musicians at Guhrau, Silesia (now Góra, Poland), and that from 1621 he served the city of Breslau in a similar capacity. A work that he wrote for a wedding on 9 May 1645 shows that he was still working then at Breslau, but no music by him can be dated between 1626 and that year. In 1621 he wrote an Actus gratulatorius in honour of the Elector of Saxony, who on 3 November that year, as the emperor's representative, accepted the homage of the Silesian Diet at Breslau, an occasion also celebrated in the Syncharma musicum of the elector's Kapellmeister, Schütz.

Schaeffer also wrote a work to mark the wedding, on 5 November 1624, of Duke Georg Rudolph of Liegnitz. In 1619 he published Advent and Christmas hymns for solo voice and continuo. His Cantiones sacrae of 1621 also comprises Advent and Christmas music, but in the motet style for eight voices; the 13 pieces in this collection were no doubt prompted by the predilection in Breslau for polyphonic settings. As one might expect of a musician in his position, Schaeffer composed a good deal of instrumental music. His Pratum musicale, for example, consists of 58 four-part dances with continuo. Here the established dance pair of pavan and galliard is always separated by a canzona and intrada. They are followed by the courante, ballet, volta and branle, all dances that Arbeau had described in detail. An interesting feature is the addition of 'so-called round dances, especially those of Polish origin' ('choreas quas vocant Polonicas'). The Promulsis epuli musicalis, for only three parts with continuo, also includes the allemande.

FRITZ FELDMANN/DOROTHEA SCHRÖDER

Schaeffer, Pierre (b Nancy, 14 Aug 1910; d Les Milles, 19 Aug 1995). French composer, theorist, writer and teacher. His tape compositions of 1948 originated musique concrète. Although his parents were musicians he embarked on a scientific career, entering the Ecole Polytechnique in 1929. In 1934 he began to work as a telecommunications engineer in Strasbourg and from 1936 he was a technician with Radiodiffusion Française. Soon he discovered that he was more attracted to literature and philosophy than to technology, and he wrote a number of essays and novels. At this time he developed a taste for communal life, first in scouting, later at Georges Gurdjieff's group meetings. In 1940 he founded Jeune France, an interdisciplinary association interested in music, theatre and the visual arts; the following year he joined Copeau and his pupils in the establishment of the Studio d'Essai, which was to become the centre of the Resistance movement in French radio and later the cradle of musique concrète. There he started work on a Symphonie de bruits, a project which later materialized as the Symphonie pour un homme seul, created with the collaboration of Pierre Henry, who joined him in 1949 and with whom he worked as a team until 1958. This work led Schaeffer away from simple tricks with disc recordings and towards systematic techniques, soon to be greatly facilitated by the availability of the tape recorder. A composer despite himself, he attracted enough attention to obtain official status for the Groupe de Recherche de Musique Concrète (GRMC) in 1951.

Two years later Schaeffer left the GRMC in the charge of Henry in order to direct the foundation and management of Radiodiffusion de la France d'Outre-mer (French overseas broadcasting). He returned to the GRMC in 1958 when, together with Ferrari and Mâche, he reformed it as the more ambitious Groupe de Recherches Musicales (GRM). The investigation of sounds and of new techniques progressed to more general research (which also incorporated instrumental resources) on the bases of musical perception. Schaeffer stopped composing and gave his attention to increasingly wide theoretical speculations after the establishment in 1960 of the Service de Recherche de la RTF, within which was set up a Groupe de Recherches sur l'Image complementary to the GRM. In 1968 he was appointed associate professor at the Paris Conservatoire to teach electro-acoustic composition. His teaching, which set out to 'decondition the ear' in order to facilitate a new perception of the world of sound was supplemented and continued by practical work carried out under the supervision of Guy Reibel. These ideas and methods were propounded at length in his fundamental theoretical work, the Traité des objets musicaux (Paris, 1966).

A man who had studied science at the Polytechnique and who looked askance at established ideas, a philosopher of art and science, a controversial anti-authoritarian, ever active, quick to question routine practices, Schaeffer was always a disturbing figure. During a sometimes stormy administrative career, he fought many battles and (with varying degrees of success) set up several movements and work groups that made their mark on the cultural life of France. His final administrative act was the foundation in 1974 of the Institut National de l'Audiovisuel (INA), which brought together the bodies responsible for research, professional training, cooperation and conservation (archives). After this last battle Schaeffer, who had reached the age of retirement, continued to teach at the Conservatoire National de Musique until 1980, maintained his connections with the GRM, now part of the INA, and had premises and studios at the Maison de la Radio in Paris, as well as enjoying considerable autonomy.

Although he had stopped composing in 1960, Schaeffer did return to the studio in 1975 at the request of François Bayle (director of the GRM from 1966) and Bernard Durr, to collaborate with the latter on an exclusively electro-acoustic work entitled Le trièdre fertile. Subsequently, after a final and ironic musical experiment in 1979, Bilude, Schaeffer kept his distance from the musique concrète of which, as he had described himself half in jest, half in earnest to Marc Pierret, he was 'the unfortunate inventor' (1969). One may agree with Michel Chion that 'his profound ambivalence towards the new musical genre he invented was to be one of the outstanding features of his work and thought' (1990).

During the years that followed, he received many tributes and distinctions, notably from the University of Tel-Aviv, the César Bastos Foundation of Brazil, the McLuhan Prize of Téléglobe Canada, and in France from the INA, the SACEM, the Ecole Polytechnique and the Cité des Sciences et de l'Industrie. He had already received the Charles Cros Prize and the Grand Prize of the Académie de Disque Français, and Jack Lang, the Minister of Culture, awarded him the insignia of Grand Officier de l'Ordre National du Mérite. Dix ans d'essais radiophoniques, La coquille à planète and Pierre Schaeffer: l'oeuvre musicale were also reissued on disc during this period.

The year before he died, Schaeffer set up a non-profit-making organization, inaugurated in November 1995, under the name of the Centre d'Etudes et de Recherche Pierre Schaeffer. The purpose of this Centre, managed by Sylvie Dallet, was to promote Schaeffer's pioneering work and to perpetuate the spirit of research which had inspired him. It holds a large stock of archives, available to artists, scholars and historians.

There are difficulties in considering Schaeffer separately as a composer, novelist and essayist, for one of his deepest wishes was to build bridges between circumscribed fields of thought. Nonetheless, it is through his musical ideas that he reached a wide public. Schaeffer's musical thought rests on the primacy of the ear over conventional aesthetic considerations. It is his view that recording has placed all sounds – whether music, noises, animal cries or whatever – on an equal footing, since all are experienced in the same manner. They may thus be treated as 'sound objects', distinct from their acoustic and notated sources. Such objects are not categorized in acoustical terms (which are related only complexly to perception) nor for aesthetic qualities, since Schaeffer distrusted both physical measurements without aural relevance and theories of musical structure. He devoted much effort to a classification of sound objects based on disciplined listening, claiming that this process does not depend on using selected listeners, and that it is a necessary preliminary to further creation.

As a teacher of electro-acoustic techniques Schaeffer was tolerant of his pupils' aesthetic views. His teaching method began with ear training through carefully directed listening, then proceeded to the synthesis of sound objects having predetermined qualities. Manipulative techniques were learnt next and finally studies were produced through the linking of objects. Schaeffer himself proceeded in this way in composing his last works, notably the Etude aux objets, which with the original Etude pathétique of 1948 was one of his most remarkable compositions, although his earlier pieces had been produced in a more empirical manner. But it is not through his compositions that he exerted most influence: his theories and his development of musique concrète were much more significant. Above all, Schaeffer saw from the outset that electro-acoustic techniques would affect many aspects of musical thought and practice, that a revolution comparable with that brought about by photography was taking place. In fact, musique concrète has much in common with photography and the cinema, particularly the fact that none of them exists outside the 'concrete' materials on which they are recorded or fixed (disc, tape, film, etc), just as a painter's work is fixed on his canvas. The expression musique concrète does not, as is frequently thought, refer to the musical use of noises (any sound is concrete) but to a method which Schaeffer saw as the opposite of musique habituelle: 'unlike the traditional procedure, which moves from the score to its execution, the process in musique concrète moves from the sounds to their organization . . .' (Pierret, 1969). This idea, based on the phenomenology of perception, gave rise to the magisterial Traité des objets musicaux. On its first publication in 1966 it was rather cooly received because of its nonconformity; today, it is regarded as a major advance in musical thinking, and has initiated prolonged theoretical discussion in modern musical studies, offering composers one of the 20th century's most fertile fields for research and innovation. Among the many original concepts propounded by Schaeffer, the idea of the 'reduced hearing' of sound, inspired by Husserl's phenomenological reduction, allowed the development of a generalized method of the classification and description of perceived sounds (sound objects), known as typo-morphology.

FRANCIS DHOMONT

Schaeffner, André (b Paris, 7 Feb 1895; d Paris, 11 Aug 1980). French musicologist and ethnomusicologist. He studied the piano and harmony with A. Philip, composition with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum (1921–4), ethnology with Marcel Mauss at the Institut d'Ethnologie (1932–3) and at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes (1934–7, diploma in religious science 1940) and archaeology with S. Reinach at the Ecole du Louvre. His career was mainly based at the department of ethnomusicology in the Musée de l'Homme which he founded in 1929 and directed until 1965. Concurrently he worked on the catalogue of the Paris Conservatoire Library (1932–41), and for 24 years (1941–65) at the CNRS. He was also artistic secretary of the Paris SO (1929–31) and of the Pléiade Concerts (1943–5), and taught at the Institut d'Ethnologie (1936–43).

Schaeffner's interests extended to both Romantic and modern music; he wrote studies of composers (Debussy, Stravinsky), individual works and aesthetics movements (especially music drama) of the 19th and 20th centuries. He also specialized in European and non-European instruments; in its field his work Origine des instruments de musique is authoritative. This led him to study the music of Africa in its social and religious context; he organized six expeditions to West Africa between 1931 and 1958. He edited the third French edition of Riemann's Musik-Lexikon, and wrote numerous articles in French encyclopedias and in the Ménestrel, Revue musicale, Contrepoints, Rassegna musicale, Revue de musicologie and Journal des africanistes. He was vice-president (1948–58) and president (1958–61) of the Société Française de Musicologie.

CHRISTIANE SPIETH-WEISSENBACHER/JEAN GRIBENSKI

Schaeftlein, Jürg (b Graz, 1929; d Vienna, 15 Feb 1986). Austrian oboist. At the Graz Landeskonservatorium (1947–51) he studied the oboe with Hans Kamesch and Hadamozsky. From 1952 to 1955 he played with the NHK SO in Tokyo, and on his return to Austria played first oboe with the Vienna Volksoper Orchestra (1955–9). In 1958 he was appointed first oboist in the Vienna SO, and between 1955 and 1960 he appeared with the Camerata Academica at the Salzburg Festival under Paumgartner. Schaeftlein was one of the first 20th-century players to revive performance on the Baroque oboe, a study to which he brought unique insights from his experience as a player of the modern Viennese oboe. He was a founding member of Vienna Concentus Musicus, directed by Nikolaus Harnoncourt, with whom he purchased in 1961 an original Baroque oboe by the 18th-century maker Paulhahn. The following year Schaeftlein played his first concerto using this instrument, and until his premature death from cancer he remained a vital member of Concentus Musicus. From 1970 he taught the oboe, and from 1980 the Baroque oboe, at the Vienna Hochschule für Musik, where David Reichenberg, Marie Wolfe, Paul Hailperin and Paul Goodwin were among his pupils. His recordings include Mozart's Oboe Concerto and all the oboe obbligati in Concentus Musicus's contributions to the Bach cantata cycle.

GEOFFREY BURGESS

Schäfer, Christine (b Frankfurt, 3 March 1965). German soprano. She studied at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik with Ingrid Figur and took masterclasses with Arleen Auger, also working with Fischer-Dieskau and Reimann (1986–9). Her recital début was at the Berlin Festival in 1988, singing the première of Reimann's Nachträume. Schäfer made her stage début as Papagena at the Monnaie in Brussels in 1991, and in 1993 made her US début as Sophie at San Francisco, leading to concert engagements throughout the USA. She created a sensation at the Salzburg Festival in 1995 as Lulu, a role she also sang at Glyndebourne the following year. Among her other roles are Pamina (Salzburg and Brussels), Gilda (1993, Berne), Lucia di Lammermoor (1994, WNO), Zerbinetta (1996, Munich), Konstanze (1997, Salzburg Festival), Zdenka (1997, Houston) and the title role in Pierrot lunaire, which she has sung with Boulez at the Théâtre du Châtelet and recorded. She is equally distinguished as a concert artist, notably in Bach, Haydn, Mozart and Mahler (Fourth Symphony), and recitalist, admired particularly in Schubert, Schumann and Richard Strauss. Her paradoxically cool yet intense voice and style, allied to a natural command of phrasing and verbal enunciation, is highly individual, as can be judged in her recordings of lieder, and as Lulu on a video from Glyndebourne.

ALAN BLYTH

Schäfer, Dirk (b Rotterdam, 25 Nov 1873; d Amsterdam, 16 Feb 1931). Dutch pianist and composer. He began his piano studies in 1888 at the Rotterdam Music School, and then studied with the support of a government scholarship at the Cologne Conservatory (1891–4) with Pauer (piano) and Wüllner (composition); in 1892 he won the Mendelssohn Prize of Berlin. After his return to Holland he made many concert tours of Germany, France, Austria and Belgium, though his artistic sensitivity kept him from travelling as an international virtuoso. In 1913–15 he gave a series of 11 concerts surveying the keyboard literature from Byrd to Debussy and Schoenberg; later in life he specialized in Chopin. Het klavier (Amsterdam, 1942), compiled from his notes by Ida Schäfer-Dumstorff, sets out his ideas on performance. His compositions show discernment and finesse; particularly in smaller forms he was able to express himself to happy effect in a style that, though related to Chopin, Skryabin and, to some extent, Brahms, has its individuality. He was at his best in writing for the piano, but the two short orchestral pieces show great skill in orchestration.

JOS WOUTERS/LEO SAMAMA

Schafer, R(aymond) Murray (b Sarnia, ON, 18 July 1933). Canadian composer and writer. He studied briefly at the University of Toronto with John Weinzweig (composition), Alberto Guerrero (piano) and Greta Kraus (harpsichord), and was also exposed to the ideas of Marshall McLuhan before being expelled for rebellious behaviour in his second year. Apart from a few additional lessons with Peter Racine Fricker, he was basically self-taught. From 1956 to 1961 he worked as a freelance journalist and BBC interviewer in Europe, during which time he prepared a BBC performance of Pound's opera Le testament de François Villon.

Returning to Canada in 1961, Schafer founded the Ten Centuries Concerts, a Toronto organization for the performance of new and rarely heard music. After a period as artist-in-residence at Memorial University, Newfoundland (1963–5), the first of many such appointments, he joined the music department at Simon Fraser University, British Columbia, where he taught until 1975. His experience there led to a series of innovatory writings on music education, proposing Cage-influenced activities that focus on creative listening and sensory awareness. In 1972, a grant from the Donner Foundation enabled him to undertake research into acoustic ecology, a field that he virtually invented, combining such disciplines as acoustics, geography, psychology, urbanology and aesthetics. This led to his book The Tuning of the World (Toronto, 1977) and the founding of the World Soundscape Project (now the World Forum for Acoustic Ecology). Schafer's book on E.T.A. Hoffmann (Toronto, 1975) and his edition of Pound's music criticism (New York, 1977) also constitute substantial contributions to music literature. After retiring from Simon Fraser in 1975, Schafer moved to rural northern Ontario, but continued to travel widely as a guest speaker and visiting professor.

Schafer's music ranges from instrumental and vocal compositions to works for the stage. His concert music tends to be highly theatrical and programmatic, often inspired by literary, philosophical, mythological or other extra-musical sources. His texts frequently feature obscure, ancient or invented languages. The earliest works of the 1950s, most notably the harpsichord concerto (1954) and the vocal cycles Minnelieder (1956) and Kinderlieder (1958), are neo-classical in style. In 1960 he turned to serialism and experimented with avant-garde approaches in a five-year effort to modernize his work. During this period he became interested in glissandi, extended range and extended vocal techniques, the acoustic exploitation of space, electronic sound, graphic notation and, to a limited degree, indeterminacy. Examples of his compositional exploration include the cantata Brébeuf (1961) and the Canzoni for Prisoners (1961–2), written on a 76-note cantus firmus to honour the founding of Amnesty International. In 1965, Schafer consolidated his new musical language in the 'fluid audio-visual poem' Loving (1963–6), commissioned and broadcast by CBC television.

Many of Schafer's orchestral works reveal an ambivalence towards the orchestra as a social institution. He wistfully parodies its repertory in Son of Heldenleben (1968), iconoclastically sabotages its concert conventions in No Longer Than 10 Minutes (1970) and introduces a snowmobile onto the stage in North/White (1973). In Lustro (1969–72) players and solo voices are distributed to all parts of the auditorium. Cortège (1977) includes choreography. Works such as East (1972), Dream Rainbow Dream Thunder (1986) and Manitou (1995) draw on the philosophies of Asian and Inuit peoples. Chamber works, including six string quartets (1970–93) and a harp quintet (Theseus, 1983), also reflect his philosophical interests. The Second Quartet, based on the rhythms of ocean waves, incorporates staged movement, as does the Third Quartet.

Schafer's compositions for voice include a substantial number of frequently performed choral works, such as Epitaph for Moonlight (1968), written primarily in graphic notation. These reach their climax in the dramatic oratorio Apocalypsis (1977), a highly charged realization of the Vision of St John followed by a nearly static paradisal Credo. Works for solo voice combine vocal romanticism with powerful texts that become arresting dramatic statements. Requiems for the Party Girl (1966) depicts suicidal hallucinations. Adieu, Robert Schumann (1976), written for Maureen Forrester, sets Clara Schumann's diary account of her husband's last days to music that incorporates Schumann's work in collage. Hymn to the Night (1976), Garden of the Heart (1981) and Gitanjali (1991) are all based on mystical texts.

In 1979 Schafer's career took its most dramatic turn. Commissioned to write a work for a trombone society, he created Music for Wilderness Lake (1979), a composition for 12 trombones situated around the shore of a small isolated lake at dawn and dusk. 'The big revolutions of musical history', he noted, 'are changes of context more than changes of style'. Thus he created 'environmental music', works that demand special types of attention from their audience. This concept is at the core of the Patria cycle (1966– ), a sequence of 12 interrelated works of music theatre. The first two works in the cycle, Wolfman and Requiems for the Party Girl, use outrageous stagecraft, texts in invented languages and obscure symbolism, and place the audience at odd angles with respect to the action. The Princess of the Stars (1981), a prologue to the cycle, begins 90 minutes before dawn at the edge of a wilderness lake; the action is performed by speakers in highly decorated canoes on the water, while the musicians remain invisible around the shore. The music culminates with the sunrise. The Greatest Show (1977–87) is music theatre cast in the form of a country fair. The audience wanders from exhibit to exhibit, accosted by strolling performers, and tries to win admission to one of three musical sideshows. Ra (1979–80), a musical dramatization of the Egyptian Book of the Dead, lasts through the night, combining music, drama, dance, taste and scent in a ritual that demands the participation of each audience member. And Wolf Shall Inherit the Moon, the epilogue to the cycle, is an eight-day wilderness camping trip. The audience prepares props and costumes, learns their parts and gathers on the final day to perform an enormous ritual. Each of these works stands independently, though they are all variants on a common mythology involving a princess, wolf and three-horned enemy, and are musically connected by a common note row. Schafer's occasional works of fiction are commentaries on the Patria cycle.

Schafer has received the Fromm Foundation Award (1972), the Jules Léger Prize for chamber music (1977) and the Prix Honegger (1980). In 1987 he became the first recipient of the Glenn Gould Award. Upon the presentation of the award, Menuhin described him as 'a strong, benevolent and highly original imagination and intellect, a dynamic power whose manifold personal expressions and aspirations are in total accord with the needs and dreams of humanity today'.

STEPHEN ADAMS

Schaffen [Scaffen], Henri [Henricus, Henrichus, Heinrich Enrico] (b early 16th century). French or South Netherlandish composer active in Italy. In his one book of madrigals (1549) he is described as a French nobleman, though the title-page of a collection of his motets refers to his coming from Flanders. His works were issued mainly in Venice from the late 1540s on. They include the above-mentioned book of madrigals, all for four voices under the note nere mensuration, and described on the title-page as being 'as new and ravishing a work as any other printed up to now' (although in the dedication the composer admitted that they were 'the first fruits' of his early efforts); 12 madrigals (ten, of which three were in the earlier print, for four voices, all ed. in CMM, lxxiii/3–4, 1980, and two for five) in five anthologies and collections published between 1547 and 1569; two books of motets for five voices (both 1564); and five motets (two for four voices, three for five) in collections from the years 1549–56, two of which were published in Nuremberg.

DON HARRÁN

Schäffer, Johann Wilhelm. See SCHEFFER, JOHANN WILHELM.

Schäffer, Michael (b Cologne, 11 Nov 1937; d Cologne, 7 Sept 1978). German lutenist. He studied with Walter Gerwig at the Staatliche Hochschule für Musik, Cologne, and made his début in Cologne in 1960. His repertory consisted mainly of Baroque music, particularly of the French school, and he made a special study of continuo playing. His performances were firmly based on first-hand knowledge of original and restored 18th-century instruments and of contemporary playing techniques, and his influence as a soloist and a teacher (notably at Queekhoven, the Netherlands) was considerable.

Schaffrath [Schafrath, Schafrat], Christoph (b Hohenstein, nr Chemnitz, 1709; d Berlin, 17 Feb 1763). German harpsichordist, composer and teacher. One of the earliest references to him was in 1733, when he applied for the position of organist at the Sophienkirche, Dresden. In his application he stated that for the past three years he had been 'harpsichordist to the king' and the Polish Prince Sangusko. Although one of three candidates short-listed, Schaffrath was unsuccessful and the post went to Wilhelm Friedemann Bach. By the following year, however, he was in the service of Crown Prince Frederick (later Frederick the Great). He was among those who moved with the prince's establishment from Ruppin to Rheinsberg in 1736, and on Frederick's accession in 1740 was installed as harpsichordist in the court Kapelle at Berlin. In 1741 he was appointed musician to the king's sister, Princess Amalia, a title which appears on contemporary publications of his music and which he was still using in the 1760s. Although he remained at Berlin until his death his name is not included in Marpurg's register of the Kapelle (1754); this implies that he left the orchestra at some point, possibly after the 1741 appointment.

As a composer Schaffrath restricted himself to instrumental music, producing a wide range of chamber and orchestral works. His main interest lay in keyboard music, and various collections of his sonatas (for keyboard alone and keyboard with melody instrument) were published during his lifetime. Almost all the harpsichord sonatas are in three movements with the standard fast–slow–fast arrangement. The first Allegro is usually in sonata form, but the opening part of the exposition is frequently omitted from the recapitulation, and when Schaffrath wrote a full recapitulation he often varied the exposition material by condensing or expanding certain sections. Schaffrath's keyboard writing in these sonatas is idiomatic yet simple: scale passages and broken-chord figures are employed with good effect but the texture is thin – seldom more than two parts – and the left hand plays a subordinate role. The concertos show the same approach to keyboard writing. Here Schaffrath followed Vivaldian formal methods, using ritornello structure in all three movements and distinguishing clearly between tutti and solo sections.

Stylistically, Schaffrath's music belongs to the transitional era. His works display characteristic galant features: tuneful melodies, short phrases, thin texture, slow harmonic rhythm and ubiquitous triplet figures. However, he also had a marked talent for counterpoint, a skill apparent not only in the occasional fugal movement (e.g. op.2 no.6, second movement) but also in the disciplined part-writing of orchestral works and in his frequent use of imitation. Although active in Berlin, Schaffrath was not particularly affected by the 'sensitive' north German style. Exceptional works reveal the influence of C.P.E. Bach in their wide-ranging themes and harmonic asperities, but Schaffrath generally preferred a less emotional style, more in keeping with Hasse's music than with the Empfindsamkeit.

PIPPA DRUMMOND

Schafhäutl, Carl Emil von (b Ingolstadt, 16 Feb 1803; d Munich, 25 Feb 1890). German scientist, acoustician, inventor and writer on music. He moved to Munich in 1827 where he met the flute virtuoso and maker Theobald Boehm, with whom he shared a life-long friendship; Schafhäutl's studies of theoretical and practical acoustics informed many of Boehm's improvements to musical instruments, including the cylindrical metal flute (1846) and, later, the oboe and bassoon. In about 1833 their first invention, the Teliophon (a pianoforte with a rounded belly) was stolen and shortly afterwards patented in London; the ensuing lawsuit brought them to England in early 1834. While there Schafhäutl began to work on metallurgical experiments; meanwhile he corresponded for the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung, writing accounts of English organ making, church music and the 1835 York festival.

After his return to Bavaria in 1841, Schafhäutl became professor of geology, mining and metallurgy at Munich university. With Caspar Ett he engaged in the debate about the reform of Catholic church music, gradually shifting his support from the cause of musical historicism, based on the traditions of unaccompanied vocal polyphony, to become a passionate defender of Classical orchestral masses against the polemical attacks of F.X. Witt.

From 1849 to 1887 Schafhäutl was an official organ examiner, reporting on more than 500 organ building projects. Schafhäutl's reports on musical instruments at the trade exhibitions in Mainz (1842), Leipzig (1850), London (1851) and Munich (1854) demonstrate his impartiality, long experience and unusual depth of knowledge. After 1853 he subsidized and participated in the musical education of the young Joseph Rheinberger. Besides his works on theoretical and practical acoustics his most important writings on musical theory and history are his still-valuable biographies and obituaries of instrument makers (including Boehm, V.F. Červený and Aloys Biber) and composers (including Ett, Gluck, G.J. Vogler and Michael Haydn) that he published during his last years.

Schale [Schaale, Schall], Christian Friedrich (b Brandenburg, 10 March 1713; d Berlin, 2 March 1800). German composer. He was a pupil of the organist Christian Rolle, then studied law for a brief period at Halle University (*c*1732). From 1735 he was a member of the orchestra of Prince Heinrich of Prussia until he was appointed to the royal Kapelle of Frederick the Great in Berlin as cellist and chamber musician (1741). He was also second organist (to Johann Philipp Sack) at Berlin Cathedral, and became cathedral organist when Sack died in 1763. He was one of the first members of Sack's Musikübende Gesellschaft, the earliest amateur concert society in Berlin (founded in 1749), and also conducted another group called the Musikalische Assemblee (made up of members of the royal Kapelle). Following Sack's death, he merged the two groups; in 1781 Schale and the singer G.C. Concialini used this orchestra to present a series of amateur concerts in Berlin.

Schale composed in a variety of genres, but few of his works were published. His music is often contrapuntal, and his keyboard works are occasionally quite virtuoso. His lieder are in the folklike style of the first Berlin lied school.

Schalk, Franz (b Vienna, 27 May 1863; d Edlach, 3 Sept 1931). Austrian conductor. A pupil of Bruckner at the Musikverein Konservatorium, he became first conductor at the Vienna Hofoper in 1900, under Mahler's directorship; he conducted the first performances of Korngold's Der Schneeman (1910) and the revised version of Ariadne auf Naxos (1916). In 1918 he became director of the Hofoper, jointly with Richard Strauss, of whose Die Frau ohne Schatten he conducted the first performance in 1919; and on Strauss's resignation in 1924, he was in sole control until 1929. He conducted at the Metropolitan Opera during the 1898–9 season, and at Covent Garden in 1898, 1907 and, when his Ring cycles were particularly admired, in 1911. In 1924 he conducted the first performance of movements from Mahler's Tenth Symphony (in Krenek's edition). Schalk and his elder brother Josef, who had also studied under Bruckner, were among the earliest champions of their master's symphonies, though they presented them in unauthentic versions prepared by themselves and others. Franz's influence is manifest in the first edition of the revised version of no.3 (1890), and Josef's in the first edition of no.8 (1892); Franz collaborated with Ferdinand Löwe in the spurious first edition of no.4 (1890), and was solely responsible for the equally spurious first edition of no.5 (1896).

DERYCK COOKE/R

Schall, Claus Nielsen (b Copenhagen, 28 April 1757; d Copenhagen, 9 Aug 1835). Danish composer, dancer and violinist. In 1772 he joined the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen as a dancer, and in 1775 became a member of the court chapel. The dancer and choreographer Vincenzo Galeotti, recognizing Schall's ability, appointed him répétiteur and director of ballet at the Royal Theatre in 1776; he also engaged Schall to compose music for many of his ballets. After travelling in the late 1780s to Paris, Dresden, Berlin and Prague (where he met Mozart), Schall returned to Copenhagen in 1792 to take Hartmann's place as Konzertmeister at the Opera, working successively under J.A.P. Schulz and F.L.A. Kunzen. In 1795 Schall became composer to the Royal Ballet and in 1818 music director at the Opera, where he remained until 1834; he conducted the première of Weber's Freischütz overture there in 1820.

Though self-taught as a composer, Schall was rated highly by his contemporaries, and his experience as a violinist (he played in the court chapel from 1779) and in the theatre gave him an unusually wide scope. His chief importance lies in his collaboration with Galeotti, for whom he wrote about 20 ballets ranging from light divertimentos to full-length tragedies (occasionally with chorus). His models were Gluck and Mozart, but his style is also perceptibly indebted to that of French dramatic music. His other music includes Singspiele, songs and instrumental pieces, of which his chamber works are particularly important, being among the first by a Danish composer.

Schall's brother, Peder Schall (bap. Copenhagen, 30 Dec 1762; d Copenhagen, 1 Feb 1820), was a cellist in the court chapel, a guitarist and composer of vocal works with guitar accompaniment.

Schannis [Schennis], Johannes von (d Zürich, 1587). Swiss burgomaster and musician. He is listed as a citizen of Zürich in 1558, a guild master (Zunftmeister) of Meisen between 1574 and 1583, a head governor (Obervogt) to the villages of Wettswil and Bonstetten during the period 1575–82, and a provincial governor (Landvogt) in Andelfingen between 1583 and 1587. Johannes is the first member of this prominent Zürich family for whom an interest in music can be documented. His musical activities, when taken together with other members of the Schannis family, reveal the types of music that were collected, copied, sung and played by several generations of this family between 1578 and 1630.

On 12 November 1578 in Speyer, Johannes purchased for 14 batzen a second edition copy of Georg Forster's Frische teutsche Liedlein (RISM 1549[35]). To this collection of German Tenorlied (CH-Zz T410–13) he added a manuscript appendix, in which he copied songs and motets by Clemens non Papa, Jean Mouton, Stephan Zirler, Nikolaus Selnecker, and Cosmas Alder. The partbooks remained in the possession of the Schannis family until 14 April 1629, when they were donated to the Zürich Public Library. Among the other family names that appear in the partbooks, Johannes's grandson, the Hebrew scholar Caspar von Schannis (1600–34) seems to have had the strongest interest in music. As well as owning his grandfather's music book, he also possessed a collection of tablature for lute and double cittern (lost), as well as a set of printed music for three lutes by Giovanni Pacolini, also lost (see BrownI).

Schanppecher, Melchior [Malcior de Wormatia] (b Worms, *c*1480). German theorist. He studied at Cologne University from 1496 to 1497, and was a member of the 'bursa montana', where later the theorists Cochlaeus, Glarean and Bogentantz also studied. Schanppecher taught Wollick and wrote the third and fourth parts of the latter's treatise, Opus aurem musicae (Cologne, 1501).

In 1502 Schanppecher studied in Leipzig, but by 1505 he was back in Cologne, where he obtained the degree of Master of Arts and where, in 1506, he published an elementary treatise on astronomy. Schanppecher's section of Wollick's treatise shows the influence of humanism, which caused practical music to become a subject for university study instead of medieval speculative theory. He discussed the notation of mensural music, and provided rules for composition. This became the first of many textbooks on composition in Germany. The treatise is based on counterpoint, and distinguishes between 'compositio' and 'sortisatio'. 'Compositio' meant the act of musical composition, which is then fixed in musical notation. 'Sortisatio' meant the improvisation of several parts to a plainchant cantus firmus. According to other sources of about 1500, Schanppecher gathered up contemporary expressions like 'ad sortem cantare' and 'sortisieren' and created out of them a theoretical term used in German theory until well into the 17th century.

Schantz [Tschantz]. American firm of organ builders. It was founded in Kidron, Ohio, in 1873 by Abraham J. Tschantz (b Kidron, 7 March 1849; d Orrville, Ohio, 14 Sept 1921), a cabinet maker of Swiss descent. Abraham (who dropped the T from his name in 1899) at first built only reed organs, and was so successful that he moved to a larger factory in Orrville in 1875. His first pipe organ was built in 1890 for the First United Brethren Church of Canton, Ohio, and not long afterwards he developed and produced the Zephyr electric fan blower. Shortly after the turn of the century Abraham's sons Edison (1878–1974), Oliver (1882–1938) and Victor (i) (1885–1973) joined the firm, followed in the 1930s and 40s by his grandsons John, Paul and Bruce, later the principals of the company with Victor Schantz (ii) and Jack Sievert. The Schantz Organ Co. grew considerably during the 20th century, and between World War II and 1970 produced over 1000 instruments. The firm's notable large instruments include those in Sacred Heart Cathedral, Newark, New Jersey (1956), the First Baptist Church, Nashville, Tennessee (1973), and Westwood United Methodist Church, Los Angeles (1994).

Schantz, (Johan) Filip von (b Ulvila, 17 Jan 1835; d Helsinki, 24 July 1865). Finnish conductor and composer. He studied law at Helsinki University from 1853, but during the Crimean War in 1855 he became involved in a political student demonstration and was expelled for one term. He abandoned law school in favour of musical studies, first in Sweden (1856–7) and subsequently at the Leipzig Conservatory (1857–60).

In 1860 Schantz became conductor of the New Theatre in Helsinki, but he resigned in 1863 following an altercation with the theatre administration. He took his musicians to Stockholm, Göteborg and Copenhagen, where they earned their living by playing light music until financial troubles forced them to close down in 1864. Schantz returned home in poor health and died the following year at the age of 30.

His compositions are representative of the national romantic movement. He collected and published folk music, and drew on subjects from the national heritage in several works, such as the Kullervo-alkusoitto ('Kullervo Overture'), based on a motif from the Kalevala, which he wrote for the inaugural ceremony of the New Theatre's new building in 1860. He also wrote many choral and solo songs.

TOIVO HAAPANEN/ILKKA ORAMO

Schantz [Schanz], Johann (b Kladrob, Bohemia, *c*1762; d Vienna, 26 April 1828). Austrian piano maker. Of the instruments his firm made between around 1790 and 1825, two square pianos and about 35 grands survive; many of them were originally exported to what is now Italy. G.A. Griesinger, Haydn's biographer, related that Schantz had made 130 instruments in one year, a figure then not unusual for a Viennese workshop. The pianos built by Schantz before about 1815 show individuality and fine workmanship. He was probably the first Viennese builder to equalize the string lengths for each choir, to divide the bridge at the change-over from brass to steel strings and to introduce individual hammer back-checks. The rival English tradition of the period probably inspired these innovations.

Johann's brother Wenzl (b Bohemia, *c*1750; d Vienna, before 17 Sept 1790) also made pianos, including one for Haydn in 1788, but none survive. Haydn's letters of June 1790 recommending Schantz probably refer to Johann, not Wenzl, and later sources refer exclusively to Johann. Haydn also owned instruments by other makers; his recommendations may have been influenced by the commission offered to him by Schantz. Beethoven denied accepting such a commission but nonetheless also recommended Schantz, acted as intermediary for him and wrote in a letter that he owned a Schantz piano. On the other hand, he returned a piano to Schantz because of its bad quality.

The reputation of the Schantz firm trailed after those of Streicher and Anton Walter in their day; Griesinger expressed an equivocal attitude in a letter to G.C. Härtel of 1803, saying that Schantz subcontracted to former apprentices, something that Streicher never did. Contemporary opinions of his instruments are not, however, entirely borne out by the pianos that survive: their touch is no lighter than that of Walter's instruments, contradicting Haydn, and Schantz's pianos imitate not Stein's but Walter's, contadicting J.F. von Schönfeld (Jahrbuch der Tonkunst von Wien und Prag, Vienna, 1796, p.88).

MICHAEL LATCHAM

Schanzlin, Hans Peter (b Basle, 2 Aug 1916; d Basle, May 1991). Swiss musicologist. He studied school music at the Basle Conservatory and musicology with Handschin at Basle University, where he took the doctorate in 1949 with a dissertation on Gletle's motets. He taught music in various schools in Basle (1941–65), and held posts as organist of the French church (1940–50), and as choirmaster at St Matthäus (1949–61). He was responsible for the first cataloguing in Swiss libraries for RISM (1956–65) and worked at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis (1959–70). In 1965 he took charge of the music section of the Basle University library. He was general secretary of the Schweizerische Musikforschende Gesellschaft (1959–72) and was president of the Basle chapter (1959–71). Schanzlin wrote a wide range of publications on Swiss music history, particularly the history of its church music in the 17th century, of which he made a fundamental study in his doctoral dissertation. In 1957 he succeeded Edgar Refardt in collecting the bibliography of 20th-century writings on Swiss music history.

Scharrer, Irene (b London, 2 Feb 1888; d London, 11 Jan 1971). English pianist. She studied at the RAM and with Tobias Matthay. She made her London début at the age of 16 and thereafter appeared regularly before the public until 12 June 1958, when, at a concert at the RAM to commemorate the centenary of Matthay's birth, she played Mozart's two-piano sonata with her cousin Myra Hess, also a pupil of Matthay. She toured Europe and the USA, and in the earlier part of her career played under such distinguished conductors as Richter and Nikisch. A sensitive rather than a powerful pianist, possessed of a beautifully even touch and capable of great refinement of phrasing, she was most happy when playing Romantic music of the 19th century, especially the smaller, more intimate compositions of Chopin.

FRANK DAWES

Scharwenka, (Ludwig) Philipp (b Samter [now Szamotuły], 16 Feb 1847; d Bad Nauheim, 16 July 1917). Polish-German composer and teacher, brother of XAVER SCHARWENKA. His early musical training was at the secondary school in Posen. In 1865 his family moved to Berlin, where he studied composition with Richard Wüerst and Heinrich Dorn at Kullak's Neue Akademie der Tonkunst. In 1868 he began his long teaching career as an instructor at the academy. Six years later, his orchestral works began to be performed, and in 1880 he married the violinist Marianne Stresow (b 25 Feb 1856; d 24 Oct 1918). When his younger brother Xaver founded the Scharwenka Conservatory in Berlin (1881) he joined its staff, teaching theory and composition. He became its co-director, with Hugo Goldschmidt, in 1891, when Xaver emigrated temporarily to the USA. Philipp was a competent, dedicated composer and teacher; his own career, however, was overshadowed by that of his forceful, energetic brother.

CHARLES SUTTONI

Scharwenka, (Franz) Xaver (b Samter [now Szamotuły], 6 Jan 1850; d Berlin, 8 Dec 1924). Polish-German pianist, composer, teacher and educationist, brother of PHILIPP SCHARWENKA. Like his elder brother he received little formal musical training until he was enrolled in the Neue Akademie der Tonkunst in Berlin in 1865 where, under Kullak's tutelage, his skill as a pianist developed rapidly. He made his début at the Singakademie, in 1869. He then taught at the academy until his military service (1873–4). In December 1874 he began the first of many concert tours that were to take him all over Europe and eventually to the USA and Canada. In 1877 he married Zenaide Gousseff and in the same year gave the first performance of the Piano Concerto in B♭ minor, his most successful and popular work apart from the Polish Dance (op.3 no.1) of 1869.

In the 1880s Scharwenka expanded his activities beyond those of a composer and pianist. In 1881 with Gustav Holländer and Heinrich Grünfeld he organized a very successful annual series of concerts of chamber and solo works at the Singakademie, and in October of the same year he opened his own conservatory in Berlin. In 1886 he conducted the first of a series of orchestral concerts devoted chiefly to major works by Liszt, Beethoven and Berlioz; meanwhile he continued to tour extensively and play his works under such men as Richter and Joachim. These multiple activities as a pianist, composer and educator-organizer occupied him for the rest of his long career.

In 1891 Scharwenka made his first tour of the USA. He decided to emigrate and opened a New York branch of his conservatory in October 1891. Seven years later, however, he moved back to Berlin. His conservatory there had merged with that of Karl Klindworth in 1893 but when Scharwenka returned the two men disagreed about policy, and Klindworth withdrew. Scharwenka continued to tour the USA and Canada and by 1914 had crossed the Atlantic 26 times. In Germany Scharwenka took part in founding the Music Teachers' Federation (1900), and was instrumental in establishing the Federation of German Performing Artists (1912). In 1914 he founded yet another music school in Berlin. He published a Methodik des Klavierspiels (Leipzig, 1907). He was also one of the foremost pianists of his generation, renowned for his beautiful, sonorous, singing tone and as an interpreter of Chopin's music. He made seven acoustical recordings for Columbia and many piano rolls. His compositions generally have melodic charm and graceful dance-like rhythms.

CHARLES SUTTONI

Schastelain, Charles [Jean]. See CHASTELAIN, CHARLES.

Schat, Peter (b Utrecht, 5 June 1935). Dutch composer and writer on music. He studied composition with van Baaren at the conservatories of Utrecht and The Hague (1952–8), with Seiber in London (1959) and with Boulez in Basle (1960–61). Between 1974 and 1983 he taught composition at the Royal Conservatory in The Hague. In 1967 he co-founded STEIM (Studio voor Elektro-Instrumentale Muziek). His awards include the Matthijs Vermeulenprize (1973, for To You) and the Joost van den Vondelprize of the Westfälische Wilhelmsuniversität of Münster (1990).

Schat's training was as a serial composer. His first compositions, such as the Introductie en adagio in oude stijl (1954) and the Septet (1957), combine traditional forms, including sonata form, with dodecaphony. But his lessons with Boulez led him to a more radical, strict form of serial thought, and even before that he was regarded in the Netherlands as one of the leading members of the avant garde of his generation. In the fourth part of the Octet (1958), dedicated to van Baaren, it is the players who determine the order of its 12 segments, while in the final part there is occasion for individual improvisation. In Improvisations and Symphonies (1960) free performer invention becomes the central component. The work also reveals Schat's inclination towards the theatrical, with spatial movement prescribed in the form of performer-directed 'promenades'. Of his Boulez-influenced pieces, Entelechie I displays structures with fixed properties and less fixed 'commentaries' upon them in the form of retrospective and anticipatory 'shadows'; the work also involves complex textures in its accumulated heterophonies. However, as Schat subsequently became involved with socio-political issues, he came to associate the static qualities of this piece and its successor, Entelechie II, with what he saw as the immobility of western social institutions serving a cold war mentality; Boulez himself was described as a 'premature specialization', a biological concept relating to a species without a chance to develop.

Ideas concerning the overthrow of established order marked a number of Schat's works of the 1960s. Labyrint, 'a kind of opera', first performed at the 1966 Holland Festival, also expands upon the idea of theatre, containing independently functioning layers of instrumental music, singing, mime, stage action, plastic arts, film, dance and set design. One of the work's aims is a disorientation of the spectator, aided by the choir – split into five separate groups spread among the audience – which passes comments in different languages, thereby discouraging any single interpretation of the spectacle. Nevertheless a plot is discernible, in which a female character, Noéma, succeeds in forcing the (unspecified) ideology of the Paradise bird on her people. The people, represented by the choir, are thus able to give meaning to what takes place, which they express by destroying the sets of the labyrinth.

On Escalation, dedicated to the memory of 'Che' Guevara and first performed at a 1968 political demonstration concert in Amsterdam, exhibits in its 'combative' design two simultaneous levels, described as 'within' and 'outside'. The former relates initially to the whole body of musicians and is supervised by the conductor, while the latter is directed by six solo percussionists, each of whom progressively guides a small group of players out of the main ensemble. Since the music 'within' is fixed and the 'outside' music consists of controlled improvisation, the players are gradually drawn out from under the conductor's authority.

In 1969, Schat was one of the leading figures in another demonstration event – the notorious 'notenkrakersactie' in which a group of activists disturbed a concert by the Concertgebouw Orchestra, demanding an open discussion of music policy. In the same year, alongside the composers Reinbert de Leeuw, Louis Andriessen, Jan van Vlijmen and Misha Mengelberg, and the writers Harry Mulisch and Hugo Claus, Schat was also involved in Reconstructie, a 'morality' theatre work, again a homage to 'Che' Guevara, about the conflict between imperialism and liberation. The symbolic central character is a US imperialist Don Giovanni, who seduces and rapes the ladies Bolivia and Cuba; his opponent is the Commendatore 'Che'.

Reconstructie marked a turning point in Schat's career. During the 1960s his anxieties about modernism's fracture with the past had grown; he also became convinced that the shift from diatonicism to chromaticism had been the most traumatic event in western music history. In what followed, Schat involved himself with trying to develop new forms of tonal coherence. At first he experimented with relating avant-garde music to the past in the form of style quotations, in for example Clockwise and Anti-Clockwise (1967) and Anathema (1969), which questions the avant garde's antipathy towards melody. Thema (1970) explored melodic relationships more systematically, while also attempting to integrate the tonal and non-tonal, the diatonic and chromatic, the avant garde, jazz and popular music. Similarly the successful To You (1972) – the beginning of a long-term collaboration with a kindred anti-imperialist spirit, the writer Adrian Mitchell – links contemporary art music to popular music, the latter conceived as the new western international folk music: the piece, while completely electronic, ends in C major.

Most significantly, Schat undertook a detailed investigation of abstract pitch relationships in what he termed 'permuteration', essentially the exploration of multiple melodic permutations, no new note being introduced until all possible orderings of the existing ones are exhausted. First employed in Anathema, this procedure is especially clear in Canto general (1974) and was also applied to intervals in the opera Houdini (1974–6). Both these last two works have overtly political messages. The opera is a metaphorical call to subjugated peoples to free themselves from their chains; Canto general, to a text by Pablo Neruda, was written in memory of the Chilean president, Salvador Allende.

In 1973 Schat co-established, with the designer Floris Guntenaar, the Amsterdam Electric Circus to 'serve the people' by giving open-air rather than standard indoor performances (involving, for instance, the projection of slides and films in a large balloon). Specific moments of history and politics continued also to give rise to or become associated with his music. For example, The Fall (1960) was eventually performed in 1974, the same year as President Nixon's demise; the Polonaise of 1981 came out of the protests at the Lenin shipyards in Gdańsk; while De hemel ('The Heavens', 1990) is dedicated to 'the martyrs of democracy at the Square of Heavenly Peace in Beijing'. But during the 1970s, Schat also further developed a musical system analogous to his democratic political ideals, which he has continued to use ever since: 'De toonklok' ('The Tone Clock'). Schat had come to the conclusion that a musical language based on the exclusion of melody and consonance could only lead to mannerism and incomprehensibility. His design for a chromatic harmonic-melodic tonality embracing both chromaticism and pure triads was eventually published in a Dutch newspaper, NRC Handelsblad, on 24 December 1982. Broadly speaking, the system is based on the 12 possible 'triads' of pitches (in other words, three-note sets under transposition and inversion) which may be found in the chromatic total. A 'tonality' or 'hour' results from the four-fold projection of such a 'triad' onto the chromatic octave to make up all 12 notes. The four notes by which the triads are transposed are referred to as a 'steering' (see ex.1). The chromatic total may also be broken up into groups of four notes, or 'tetrads', which are themselves 'steered' by the triadic formations. In such a way smooth transitions and 'modulations' can be made between the different 'tonalities'. Schat has gone on to make the system more flexible by mixing tonalities, as well as by preserving the free ordering of pitches within each triad or tetrad, as well as the free ordering of triads or tetrads within a tonality. The concept of the Tone Clock emerged during the composition of works such as Houdini, the Symphony no.1 (1978, rev. 1979) and the cartoon opera Aap verslaat de knekelgeest (1980). The Second Symphony (1983, rev. 1984) is a preliminary study for the opera Symposion (1982–9), in which each of the protagonists is characterized by their own Tone Clock tonality; the libretto by Gerrit Komrij interweaves Plato's text with the story of Tchaikovsky's forced suicide, as reconstructed by the musicologist Alexandra Orlova. Among the larger works of the 1990s which employ the method are the 12 symphonic variations of Die hemel and Een Indisch Requiem (1993–5).

ROKUS DE GROOT

Schattenberg, Thomas (b Flensburg, *c*1580; d ?Copenhagen, after 1623). Danish composer and organist. After studying in Hamburg he was appointed organist at St Nikolai, Copenhagen, in 1604. He published Jubilus S Bernhardi de nomine Jesu Christi Salvaloris nostri (Copenhagen, 1620; ed. E. Barfod and others, Copenhagen, 1988), consisting of 39 four-part motets, and Flores amoris (Copenhagen, 1622), a collection of 24 three-part pieces, mainly to German secular texts, of which only the bassus part survives. Schattenberg's life, work and milieu have been summarized in E. Barfod and others: 'Thomas Schattenberg, en dansk komponist fra Chr. IV's tid: hans liv, hans vaerk og hans miljø', Musik & Forskning, xiii (1987–8), 5–36.

Schechner [Schechner-Waagen], Nanette [Anna] (b Munich, 1806; d 29 April 1860). German soprano. She studied with an actor named Weber, and first sang in the chorus of the Munich Opera when she was 15. Chosen from the singing school by Giuseppina Grassini, on a Munich visit, to second her in excerpts from Cimarosa's Gli Orazi ed i Curiazi, she made a great impression, and won the patronage of the Queen of Bavaria. After being sent to study in Italy from 1822, she reappeared in Munich as a principal, at first in Italian opera (including the role of Mozart's Countess). Moving to Vienna, she made her dêbut as Emmeline in Weigl's Die Schweizerfamilie on 22 May 1826. Schubert wrote: 'Mlle Schechner ... pleased exceedingly. As she looks very much like Milder, she might be good enough for us' (letter of May 1826). In December 1826 she visited Beethoven with the tenor Ludwig Cramolini, to whom she was then engaged, and sang Fidelio to the deaf composer. She turned to German opera conclusively in 1827 on accepting an engagement at Berlin. Fétis recounted how she began her opening performance, as Emmeline, to an almost empty theatre on a fine summer Sunday, but her performance aroused such admiration that word spread in the interval to the neighbouring cafés, and she completed the performance to a full and enthusiastic house. She sang at the Theater an der Wien in 1829, and returning to Munich in 1832 she married the painter Karl Waagen. Her career was interrupted by a chest disease (of nervous origin, according to Fétis) that led to a serious decline and forced her to retire in 1835. When Mendelssohn heard her in Munich in 1830 he wrote: 'Schechner has indeed lost much; the quality of the voice is husky; she often sang out of tune, and yet at times her inner warmth was so touchingly revealed that I was moved to tears' (letter of 6 June 1830). She was described as possessing in her prime an exceptionally rich and full-toned voice, and a natural, unpretentious dramatic talent. Her most successful roles were Fidelio, Donna Anna, Euryanthe, Reiza, the Tauris Iphigenia and Spontini's Vestal.

Schede, Paul Melissus (b Mellrichstadt, Hessen, 20 Dec 1539; d Heidelberg, 3 Feb 1602). German musician and poet. Prompted by his mother's name, Ottilie Melisse, he added to his name the symbolic 'Melissus' from Greek mythology. After studying at Würzburg, Erfurt, Zwickau and Jena he became Kantor at Königsberg, Franconia. He was crowned poet in Vienna in 1561, raised to the rank of hereditary nobleman in 1564 and given the titles 'Comes Palatinus', 'Eques Auratus' and 'Civis Romanus' in Italy in October 1579. Meanwhile he went to France in 1567 but had to flee Paris a few years later during the persecution of the Huguenots; he got to know Goudimel at Besançon and became a follower of Calvin at Geneva, and the Elector Friedrich III of Speyer commissioned from him a version of the psalms for the Reformed Church, Di Psalmen Davids in teutische Gesangreimen nach französischer Melodeien unt sylben Art (Heidelberg, 1572; ed. in Jellinek). He travelled in Germany, Italy and France and in 1585 and 1586 was in England, where Elizabeth I, impressed by him as musician and poet, tried to persuade him to stay. But he returned to Germany and lived at Heidelberg until his death.

Schede wrote the poems, in German, Latin and Greek, that he set to music. Two volumes of poetry were published in Frankfurt in 1574 and 1575. His settings scrupulously follow the metrical structures of the verses, which are further enhanced by the carefully conceived melodies. They are thus typical of humanist music of the period.

Schedl, Gerhard (b Vienna, 5 Aug 1957). Austrian composer. He studied at the Vienna Hochschule für Musik und Darstellende Kunst (1976–80) where his teachers included Urbanner and at the University of Vienna (1976–80). In 1981 he was appointed to the Hoch Conservatory, Frankfurt. He has also taught at the University of Mainz (1982–6) and served as composer-in-residence at the Salzburg Landestheater (1990–97). His music has been performed at the Graz 'musikprotokoll' festival, the Dresden festival, the Wiesbaden May festival and many other similar events. Composition is for him both an intellectual and a dramatic act governed by dramatic rules newly formulated for each piece. He sees his music as a simultaneous coexistence and breach with tradition, a combination of the extant and the invented, a kind of musical disobedience inspired by a love of music.

Especially notable in his oeuvre is the Third Symphony, a work commissioned by the Vienna Musikverein and given its première by the Vienna SO under Horst Stein in 1992. (LZMÖ)

RAINER BONELLI

Schedlich [Schädlich], David (b St Joachimsthal, Bohemia, 1607; d Nuremberg, bur. 11 Nov 1687). German organist and composer of Bohemian origin. He received his first musical training from his elder brother Jakob, who had studied with Hans Leo Hassler (the Hassler and Schedlich families were related). When Schedlich settled in Nuremberg, probably in the 1620s, the only Hassler musician whom he could have met was Johann Benedikt Hassler, the organist of the Frauenkirche. The first record of Schedlich in Nuremberg is his marriage in 1631 to a daughter of Johann Staden. He thus entered Nuremberg's most influential circle of musicians and was assured of a secure position in the city's musical life. In 1632 he became second organist of the Frauenkirche, and he was organist of the Spitalkirche from 1634 to 1655. His final promotion came in the latter year when he succeeded his brother-in-law S.T. Staden as organist of St Lorenz. His reputation appears to have been purely local, though when in 1653 he and Staden were invited to test a new organ at Bayreuth they were referred to there as 'the famous Nurembergers'. Had it not been for two printed collections of instrumental music, Musikalisches Kleeblatt and Musicalisches Stamm-Büchlein, Schedlich would probably have been ignored by historians; unfortunately neither has survived. His extant music is of little significance. The instrumental works lack technical skill and artistic finesse, though they are really too few for a fair judgment to be made. As with his Nuremberg colleagues, most of his output consists of strophic songs, which as an organist he was often commissioned to write for funerals. His major extant works are the chorale cantata Nun lob mein Seel den Herren and his ten settings of Domine ad adjuvandum and the Teutsche Magnificat. While the chief feature of these works is their concertato style, a striking characteristic is the instrumental nature of the vocal parts. This reflects Schedlich's preoccupation with organ playing, and it is probably as an organist that he chiefly deserves to be remembered.

Scheffer [Schäffer], Johann Wilhelm (fl 1676–94). German composer of Swiss origin. In his publication of 1676 he stated that his family came from Koblenz in the Swiss canton of Aargau and that at the time he was a prefect at Illertissen, Bavaria. By 1694 he was an actuary in the service of Count Fürstenberg at Mösskirch, Swabia. His Missae concertatae duabus et tribus vocibus absque instrumentis (Ulm, 1676) contains typical concertato works for a few voices only. He is also known by Chorus Marianus, das ist: Die Melodyen oder Weisen über den Marianischen Reyen sambt beygefügten Ritornellen a 2 Violinen (Überlingen, 1694), which consists of sacred songs characteristic of those written in south Germany at the time; the words are by Theobaldus. Scheibe, Johann (b Zschortau, *c*1680; d Leipzig, 3 Sept 1748). German organ builder, father of JOHANN ADOLF SCHEIBE. He probably trained with Christoph Donati the elder. He was in Leipzig from 1705, and in 1713 he succeeded Christoph Donati the younger as 'Universitätsorgelmacher'. His duties included the care of all the city's organs. From 1726 he worked outside Saxony, but he returned to Leipzig in 1730. In the same year he examined the organ built by David Apitsch in Leutzsch near Leipzig. J.S. Bach, together with the organ builder Zacharias Hildebrandt, enthusiastically approved Scheibe's organ in the Johanniskirche, Leipzig (built in 1742–3). After the inauguration of this instrument Scheibe was involved in a legal dispute with the city of Leipzig, from 1743 to 1745, over payment for his work. It is hard to determine just how far Scheibe's specifications were influenced by Bach. The composer also appraised the Scheibe instruments in the Paulinerkirche, Leipzig (1711–16) and in Zschortau (1745–6; restored 1999). The Breslau organ builder Adam Orazio Casparini worked with Scheibe as adviser on the Paulinerkirche organ.

An interesting feature of Scheibe's specifications is the full Principal chorus. He made reed stops from 16′ through to 2′; 8′ foundation stops are not so numerous. The large instrument in the Paulinerkirche had stops transmitted from the Hauptwerk to the weaker Pedal division. Scheibe's contemporaries described him as a 'celebrated' organ builder. He probably also made pianos.

FELIX FRIEDRICH

Scheibe, Johann Adolph (b Leipzig, 5 May 1708; d Copenhagen, 22 April 1776). German composer and theorist, son of JOHANN SCHEIBE. Johann Adolph contributed an autobiography to Mattheson's Grundlage einer Ehren-Pforte in which he reported the loss of his right eye at the age of six in an accident in his father's shop. At 11 he entered the school at the Nikolaikirche where his education conformed to his father's hopes for him of a career in law. In 1725 he entered Leipzig University to continue studies in jurisprudence, and at this time heard lectures by and became acquainted with Johann Christoph Gottsched, professor of poetry and rhetoric, whose works on the reform of drama and poetry deeply influenced Scheibe's own writings on music theory and aesthetics. However, his university education was abandoned when a family financial crisis forced him to remain at home. Although he said that he had begun to study keyboard instruments at the age of six, it was only at this time that he gave serious thought to music as a career. He read everything he could find about music, and began to practise the organ with the hope of becoming a professional, to compose music and to study philosophy. Scheibe was therefore largely self-taught as a musician and scholar; his own writings were to reveal his remarkable command of musical knowledge.

In 1729 Scheibe applied for the organ position open at the Nikolaikirche, where Bach was one of the examiners; but Johann Schneider secured the post. He also failed in his attempts to gain organ appointments at Prague and Gotha in 1735 as well as Sondershausen and Wolfenbüttel in 1736. In the latter year he moved to Hamburg where he established himself as a music critic and composer, and could count Telemann among his influential friends. In 1737 he initiated the publication, fortnightly throughout 1738 (26 issues), of his Critische Musikus (title adapted after Gottsched's Versuch einer critischen Dichtkunst), which after a one-year pause was continued as a weekly in 1739–40 (in 78 issues). In addition, according to his autobiography, he composed large quantities of music, now largely lost, including over 150 church pieces, 150 flute concertos, more than 30 violin concertos, and numerous sinfonias, trios, solos, German and Italian cantatas, serenades, Passion oratorios and one opera, Artaban. The opera was intended for performance in Hamburg, but could not be produced when the opera company closed in 1738. A second opera, Thusnelde (1744), was also never performed. In 1739 Scheibe was named Kapellmeister to Margrave Friedrich Ernst of Brandenburg-Culmbach, the governor of Holstein. In 1740 he went to Christian VI's court in Denmark to direct one of his cantatas at the dedication of the Slotskirke in the Christiansborg Palace. After other 'test' performances before the Danish king, Scheibe was made Kapellmeister to the Danish court on 1 December, a position he retained until the death of Christian VI in 1747. The new king, Frederik V, retired Scheibe with a meagre pension of 400 talers, replacing him with Paolo Scalabrini, composer with the visiting Mingotti opera troupe. Scheibe moved to Sønderborg (on Als island), where he opened a music school for children, worked on German translations of several Danish classics, wrote a biography of Holberg and continued to compose. Later, he often returned to Copenhagen for performances of his music, and after 1766 resumed a role as a composer for the Danish court.

As a composer Scheibe is unknown. Much of his music has been lost, but the remainder has not received the study it surely merits, particularly in view of its potential importance in Danish music history in the critical years of style change between the Baroque and Classical periods.

Most of Scheibe's critical writings are extant, but these too have not received the attention they deserve considering that Scheibe was a major German music theorist and an influential critic during the first half of the 18th century. He has been neglected largely because of his famous criticism of J.S. Bach's musical style in the Critische Musikus (no.6). From its publication in 1737, this passage entangled Scheibe in a verbal war with writers who vehemently protested against his attack on Bach. Although Bach himself never responded, he was defended by J.A. Birnbaum, a teacher of rhetoric in Leipzig, as well as by Lorenz Mizler, C.G. Schröter and others. Almost every Bach scholar since Spitta has disparaged Scheibe's remarks about Bach, and Scheibe's credibility as a music critic and theorist has in effect been greatly diminished, and his major theoretical statements, including the bulk of the Critische Musikus, consequently neglected. In an anonymous letter Scheibe said of Bach (although without actually naming him) that 'this great man would be the admiration of whole nations if he had more amenity, if he did not take away the natural element in his pieces by giving them a bombastic [schwülstig] and confused style, and if he did not darken their beauty by an excess of art' (see David and Mendel). He continued by suggesting that Bach's instrumental and vocal style posed exceedingly difficult problems of performance because Bach wrote his music as if it were all meant to be played on the keyboard. He chided him for writing out all the ornamentation (often left by other composers to realization in performance), which Scheibe thought took away from the beauty of the harmony and obscured the melody. Finally, Bach's bombast, he said, brought his labour into conflict with nature. In the Bach literature Scheibe has been accused of writing with rancour because Bach had prevented his appointment as organist at the Nikolaikirche; there is no evidence to support such a petty view, and it is clear elsewhere in the Critische Musikus that Scheibe had a genuine admiration and respect for Bach. If Scheibe's critics had examined the rest of his theoretical works, they would have found that his negative reaction to Bach's style was not heretical, but rather a natural and predictable conclusion in the light of his own carefully developed concepts about the nature of musical style. Scheibe believed the best music of his day was represented by the works of Telemann, Hasse and Graun. As a critic in the forefront of the Enlightenment, who argued for a return to simplicity, to an imitation of nature and to an emphasis on persuasive melody, Scheibe could not but find Bach's music open to some mild criticism.

A fresh evaluation of Scheibe's ideas is now needed. Beginning with his youthful treatise in manuscript, Compendium musices theoretico-practicum (published as a supplement to Benary), and throughout several other publications, there is consistent evidence of his originality and progressiveness as a music theorist. In the Critische Musikus particularly, the major thrust of his musical criticism is to prove that Italian music must not serve as a basis for German composers, and that musical styles are to be conceived in rational concepts based largely on a close analogy to rhetorical principles of style. These views, as well as numerous others, were undoubtedly the result of Gottsched's persuasive influence, as was Scheibe's search for a new rationalism in music generally. He developed at considerable length concepts such as 'good taste', melodic composition, musical invention (which he believed was inborn, not learnt) and the imitation of nature 'which is the true essence of music as well as of rhetoric and poetry'. The Critische Musikus, like his other theoretical documents, is infused with principles of musical thought characteristic of the developing Classical style in music. With a grasp of Scheibe's total musical philosophy, one can understand why the music of Bach, in 1737, was open to criticism for being 'bombastic and confused', and why these remarks accurately symbolize the end of the Baroque age in German music.

GEORGE J. BUELOW

Scheibel, Gottfried Ephraim (b Breslau, 1696; d Breslau, 1759). German theologian. According to Eitner, he studied theology in Leipzig and became a teacher at the Elisabeth-Gymnasium, Breslau, in 1736. He had previously lived in Oels (now Oleśnica), Silesia, where he wrote his most important music treatise, Zufällige Gedancken von der Kirchenmusic (1721). This significant book presents a clear statement on the value of music in the Protestant church service at that time, particularly its role in moving the emotions of the congregation in harmony with the word of God. Scheibel defended the place of music in the church against the attacks of those he called 'Zwingelianer'. He was one of the first to suggest that women deserved admission to church choirs, and that the ever-growing scarcity of good boy sopranos made the need for women critical. He also supported the parody practice, giving examples showing the substitution of sacred texts for secular ones used in opera arias by G.P. Telemann. He urged that the theatrical style be used to enliven church music, adding: 'I do not understand why the opera alone should have the privilege to move us to tears, and why this is also not appropriate to the church'. Scheibel's work was warmly praised by Mattheson in Critica musica (Hamburg, 1722), and there seems to have been a close professional relationship between the two. Scheibel dedicated his Musicalisch-poetische andächtige Betrachtungen to Mattheson, and the latter reciprocated by dedicating Der neue Göttingische ... Ephorus (Hamburg, 1727) to Scheibel. (EitnerQ)

GEORGE J. BUELOW

Scheibler, Johann Heinrich (b Montjoie [now Monschau], 11 Nov 1777; d Krefeld, 20 Nov 1837). German acoustician. He was a silk manufacturer in Krefeld, and had a lifelong interest in acoustics. He is best known for his proposal to the Stuttgart Congress of Physicists in 1834 that the pitch a′ have a standard frequency of 440 Hz (this being the mean of contemporary Viennese pianos); a′ 440 has consequently been called 'the Stuttgart pitch'. Scheibler also developed a 'tonometer' consisting of 52 tuning-forks, each tuned to beat about four times a second with its higher and lower neighbours (beat frequencies were first treated systematically by Sauveur in 1701); this apparatus, now lost, is described in his Der physikalische und musikalische Tonmesser (Essen, 1834). A 56-fork tonometer spanning the octave a=220 to a′=440 did survive and was described by Ellis (Helmholtz/Ellis, 1885).

Using the tonometer, Scheibler was able to manufacture tuning-forks for all 13 pitches in the equal tempered octave a=220 to a′= 440; with these forks he experimented with different methods of equal temperament. First, he tried matching the pitches in the octave a–a′ to those of the tuning-forks. When this was done (when there was no perceptible beating), the rest of the instrument was tuned in octaves to the reference pitches; the results were imprecise enough for Scheibler to manufacture another set of forks, each one tuned four Hz lower than the required pitch. He then proceeded to sharpen each pitch of the reference set, relative to the 'flattened' tuning-forks, until he counted four beats per second. Tuning by beat frequency gave better results than tuning by unisons, but both methods were laborious and inefficient (as was a third method that made use of no tuning-forks at all), and did not become widely accepted. However, Scheibler's researches represented a significant advance for German musicians, most of whom, according to Loehr (Über die Scheibler'sche Erfindung, 1836), had never heard equal temperament before 1834. The theoretical issues were well known, but Scheibler's tonometer and tuning-forks gave a practical means for obtaining a decent equality of temperament. His achievement was all the more remarkable given the informal nature of his scientific background. As he himself stated in the preface to Der physikalische und musikalische Tonmesser: 'to write clearly and briefly on a scientific subject is a skill I do not possess, and have never attempted' (Helmholtz/Ellis, 1885).

Scheibler also invented the AURA, an instrument assembled from several heteroglot jew's harps and described by him in a short treatise of 1816. The aura and jew's harp enjoyed a brief vogue in the first decades of the 19th century and fell out of favour thereafter. Scheibler was one of its foremost performers.

KEVIN MOONEY

Scheidemann [Scheideman, Schideman], David (d Hamburg, *c*1629). German organist. Early in 1595 he was appointed organist in Wöhrden, in the Dithmarschen region of Schleswig-Holstein, where his two sons, Heinrich and the painter Philipp, may have been born. It is uncertain whether he had another post before he moved to the Catharinenkirche in Hamburg in 1604. In that year the Melodeyen Gesangbuch, which contains Scheidemann's only extant compositions, was published. Shortly after his appointment, he initiated an extensive rebuilding of the organ in the Catharinenkirche, undertaken in 1605–6 by Hans Scherer the elder. Scheidemann's organ compositions, like those of many of his colleagues, do not survive. The 14 cantional settings in the Melodeyen Gesangbuch (Hamburg, 1604; ed. K. Ladda and K. Beckmann (Singen, 1995)), despite the limited stylistic range imposed by the publisher, show some lively and rhythmically interesting part-writing, particularly in the lower voices.

Scheidemann, Heinrich (b Wöhrden, Holstein, *c*1595; d Hamburg, 26 Sept 1663). German composer, organist and teacher. A founder of the north German organ school, he was one of the leading organ composers of the 17th century, notable above all for his chorale-based works.

1. LIFE. Scheidemann's father, David Scheidemann, organist at Wöhrden from 1594, moved to a similar post at St Katharinen, Hamburg, by 1604, when, like Hieronymus Praetorius, Jacob Praetorius (ii) and Joachim Decker, he contributed some pieces to the Hamburg Melodeyen Gesangbuch. From November 1611 to November 1614 Heinrich Scheidemann studied at Amsterdam with Sweelinck who dedicated to him, when he left, a canon 'Ter eeren des vromen Jonghmans Henderich Scheijtman, van Hamborgh' (facs. in J.P. Sweelinck: Werken, ix, Leipzig, 1901, no.14, p.77). The next surviving contemporary notice of him records him as occupying his father's former position as organist at St Katharinen, Hamburg, in 1629; according to Gerber he took up the post in 1625, but this cannot now be substantiated. He retained it until his death and was also clerk of the church from 1633. He died of the plague.

As organist of St Katharinen, Scheidemann not only held an important and remunerative position but was working in a city that enjoyed a flourishing musical life and offered many opportunities for fruitful friendship and collaboration with musicians and other artists, for instance with the Kantor Thomas Selle, with organist colleagues such as Jacob Praetorius (ii) and later Matthias Weckmann, with the leader of the Hamburg city musicians, Johann Schop (i), and with the poet Johann Rist. The organ at St Katharinen was an excellent instrument, which Scheidemann had enlarged by Gottfried Fritzsche in the mid-1630s to 56 stops (four manuals and pedals). He was highly esteemed as an organist, organ expert, composer and teacher. Apart from J.A. Reincken – his assistant from 1658 and successor after his death, who married his daughter in 1665 – his pupils included Werner Fabricius, Wolfgang Wessnitzer of Celle and Wolfgang Druckenmüller of Schwäbisch Hall. As both organist and organ composer Scheidemann exerted an influence on Weckmann, who had been a pupil of Jacob Praetorius (ii) and according to Mattheson strove 'to temper the gravity of Praetorius with the sweetness of Scheidemann'.

2. WORKS. Of Sweelinck's many well-known north German pupils, it is Scheidemann whose organ music survives in the largest number of sources. This is due not only to the chance survival of manuscripts but also to the fact that contemporary north German organists esteemed and disseminated his works. He concentrated almost exclusively on the single genre of organ music, where he was an important innovator. His organ works date from the early years of the north German organ school and represent its first peak; most of them came to light only when Gustav Fock discovered the organ tablatures at Clausthal-Zellerfeld in 1955 and 1960. Scheidemann's harpsichord works, though much less numerous and ambitious than his organ music, were apparently widely disseminated as well. He also published several continuo songs to texts by Rist, less, no doubt, from a love of the genre than from his friendship with the poet.

Scheidemann's style was forged in the first instance through his response to the keyboard works of his teacher Sweelinck, which are a blend of the style of the English virginalists – essentially conceived for the keyboard, with virtuoso figuration – and classical Italian and Spanish vocal and instrumental polyphony of the second half of the 16th century. His most important achievement as a composer lies largely in his extension of Sweelinck's keyboard style into a specifically organ idiom by harnessing the musical and technical resources of the north German Baroque organ. His finest and most important works are his chorale arrangements, and a series of four-movement Magnificat settings, which form a unified group by virtue of his complete exploration of the eight Magnificat tones and the use in each setting of a cyclic construction. Though Sweelinck's influence can be seen in all his instrumental writing, it is nowhere more apparent than in the technique of his organ chorale arrangements. Many of Sweelinck's arrangements involve a single, continuous, almost unembellished presentation of the cantus firmus in one part, and it was natural for Scheidemann to follow him in this procedure. But Samuel Scheidt, a somewhat older pupil of Sweelinck, seems also to have inspired him through his Tabulatura nova (Hamburg, 1624), especially its Magnificat arrangements, which adopt the form of the chorale ricercare frequently found in the third part of the volume. To these borrowed techniques Scheidemann added two forms that he himself helped to develop: the monodic organ chorale – embellished cantus firmus in the descant on the Rückpositiv, harmonically complementary inner parts on an accompanying manual, bass in the pedals – which can be seen as a transcription for organ of the solo song with continuo; and the virtuoso, musically sophisticated chorale fantasia either on two manuals or on two manuals and pedals. The latter, in which the north German organ motet appears enriched with elements of Sweelinck's style (notably the echo technique), became the north German chorale form par excellence, and Scheidemann sometimes extended it to over 200 bars. With 16 chorale fantasias, he can be considered both the actual creator and the main exponent of the genre. His influence on the younger composers of the north German organ school rested largely on these two modern forms conceived specifically in terms of the organ.

In his organ music without cantus firmus Scheidemann, unlike Scheidt in his Tabulatura nova, did not develop Sweelinck's form of the grand fantasia but cultivated instead the more modest form of the 'praeambulum', which developed from the short improvised introit. His praeambula are historically important. Their fugal middle sections, in which he sometimes referred to Sweelinck's echo fantasias and toccatas, are sometimes so long that they become the main part of the work, and since the final section is occasionally much curtailed, these works seem to approach the two-movement form of prelude and fugue. Of his other freely structured organ compositions the largest and most important is the Toccata in G (for manuals), in which he combined Sweelinck's formal ideas with up-to-date, typically north German treatment of the organ with more than one manual. Besides his original organ works he left arrangements of 12 embellished motets, almost all of them by Lassus or H.L. Hassler, in which he sometimes used musical and technical methods similar to those found in the chorale fantasias. These pieces probably replaced choral performances: it is known from the trial recital Weckmann had to give at the Jacobikirche, Hamburg, in 1655 that extemporization of such works was still part of an organist's duties after the middle of the century.

Scheidemann's harpsichord music can be divided into two styles. One has strong associations with the (dance) variations of Sweelinck, and the English virginalist tradition. It is characterized by a contrapuntal bias and by florid, virtuoso writing. The other style is more forward-looking, using modern dance forms with a lighter, more homophonic texture. Some allemande-courante pairs can be seen as early manifestations of the keyboard suite.

Scheidemantel, Johann Christian. See MANTEL, JOHN CHRISTIAN.

Scheidemantel, Karl (b Weimar, 21 Jan 1859; d Weimar, 26 June 1923). German baritone. He studied with B. Borchers and Julius Stockhausen, making his début in 1878 as Wolfram in Tannhäuser at Weimar, where he was engaged until 1886. He then sang at Dresden until 1911. After a guest appearance in Munich (1882) as Wolfram, he made his London début at Covent Garden in the same role (1884), and that season also sang Pizarro in Fidelio, Telramund in Lohengrin, Kurwenal in Tristan und Isolde and Rucello in Stanford's Savonarola; he returned in 1899 to sing Hans Sachs. He appeared at every Bayreuth festival from 1886 to 1892, alternating as Klingsor and Amfortas in Parsifal, and singing Kurwenal, Hans Sachs and Wolfram, a part he also sang in Vienna (1899) and at La Scala, Milan (1892). A stylish singer with a fine, well placed voice, he was as successful in Italian as in German roles; at Dresden, he sang Alfio in Cavalleria rusticana (1891), David in L'amico Fritz (1892) and Scarpia in Tosca (1902), all first local performances. He created two Richard Strauss roles, Kunrad in Feuersnot (1901) and Faninal in Der Rosenkavalier. After his retirement he taught at the Musikhochschule in Weimar until 1920, and then directed the Landesbühnen Sachsen, Dresden-Radebeul, for two years.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Scheidler, Johann David (b 1748; d Gotha, 20 Oct 1802). German cellist and composer. He was possibly brought to the Gotha Kapelle by theatre co-director Konrad Ekhof, and was employed as a chamber musician and orchestral member. Studying cello with the court virtuoso, H.B. Preysing, Scheidler became a member of this well-respected musical family by marrying his teacher's daughter Sophie Elisabeth Preysing, herself a distinguished singer. Their daughter Dorette, a noted harpist, married Louis Spohr in 1806. The Scheidler family, including sons violinist Friedrich Wilhelm and cellist Julius Carl, were active in the humanistic movement which surrounded the court. Scheidler took an active interest in the philanthropic school founded by C.G. Salzmann in nearby Schnepferthal, and often performed there with the students. For his own work as a teacher he published in Gotha a Sammlung kleiner Klavierstücke für Liebhaber (1779, 2/1781) and a second collection of Kleine Klavier- und Singstücke (1787), as well as a song Die Hand der Geliebten (1783), all in a Classical style approaching the Rococo. Some works by him also appeared in anthologies, and Eitner listed several in manuscript.

Scheidt, Gottfried (b Halle, 20 Sept 1593; d Altenburg, bur. 3 June 1661). German composer and organist, younger brother of SAMUEL SCHEIDT. He studied with Sweelinck in Amsterdam from 1611 to 1615. He continued to study on returning to Halle, where his brother was among his teachers. In 1617 he became organist to the ducal court at Altenburg. In 1622 he applied – at the instance of his brother, who had refused it – for the post of principal organist at the Marienkirche, Danzig; he had to remain there until 1623 for the applicants' tests, in which he was passed over in favour of Paul Siefert. He thereupon resumed his position at Altenburg and held it until he retired, because of increasing age and infirmity, on 5 May 1658. He was much respected as an organist and was on excellent terms with the ruling family, who encouraged music even during the Thirty Years War; they gradually built up a small Hofkapelle, which he directed. Apart from his contributions to the set of variations on Allein Gott in der Höh sei Ehr composed jointly by Sweelinck and others in 1614, no organ music by him is known. His other known works are all vocal and probably all occasional pieces.

NIGEL FORTUNE

Scheidt, Samuel (b Halle, bap. 3 Nov 1587; d Halle, 24 March 1654). German composer and organist. An important member of the first generation of Baroque composers in Germany, he distinguished himself in both keyboard and sacred vocal music, combining traditional counterpoint with the new Italian concerto style.

1. Life. 2. Instrumental works: (i) Keyboard music (ii) Ensemble music. 3. Canons. 4. Vocal works. 5. Conclusion.

1. LIFE. Scheidt was the eldest surviving son of Konrad Scheidt, municipal beer and wine steward and later superintendent of water for the city of Halle, and his wife Anna, daughter of Simon Achtmann, a baker. Although there were no known musicians among his forebears, the family counted the organists Wolff Eisentraut and Salomon Kramer and the organ builder Heinrich Compenius the younger as close friends. Two younger sons also became organists, Gottfried (see SCHEIDT, GOTTFRIED) and Christian (born in 1600 and who worked at Eisleben, Alsleben and Frankenhausen).

Scheidt attended the local Gymnasium, where he was probably instructed in music by the Kantor, Matthäus Birkner, and his successor, Georg Schetz. By December 1604 – quite possibly by 1603 – he had become organist at the Moritzkirche, one of the three city churches; his tenure of this post is documented up to April 1607 and may have extended to 1608. It must have been about this time that he went to Amsterdam for a period of study with Sweelinck, which is mentioned by Mattheson and attested to by many similarities in keyboard style as well as by Scheidt's announcement in 1630 of a forthcoming edition by him of Sweelinck fantasias. He had returned to Halle by the end of 1609 as court organist to the new administrator, Margrave Christian Wilhelm of Brandenburg. His duties included playing the organ for services at the castle chapel or the cathedral as well as providing secular keyboard music. Among the other court musicians were the lutenist Valentin Strobel (i) and the English violist William Brade, who was briefly Kapellmeister. The Kapellmeister in absentia was Michael Praetorius, who himself directed the festive music for the baptism of Christian Wilhelm's first child in April 1616. In 1618 Scheidt again had the opportunity to work with Praetorius, and also with Schütz, since all three were asked to provide special music in the concerted style for Magdeburg Cathedral. Both Praetorius and Schütz were present, together with Johann Staden, when Scheidt gave the dedicatory recital for the new organ at the Stadtkirche, Bayreuth, on 15 August 1619. With Brade's departure, Scheidt was appointed court Kapellmeister in late 1619 or early 1620; he retained his post as organist. The years 1620–25 were extremely productive and probably the happiest of his career. He built up the court musical establishment so that in 1621 it numbered ten instrumentalists and five vocal soloists. He published in quick succession a collection of motets (Cantiones sacrae, 1620), three volumes of instrumental ensemble music (Ludi musici, 1621, 1622, 1624), a volume of large-scale vocal concertos (Concertus sacri, 1622) and his three-volume magnum opus of organ music, the Tabulatura nova (1624). In 1624 he also supervised the rebuilding by his friend Johann Heinrich Compenius of the Moritzkirche organ; he himself drew up the specifications (listed in Werke, vii, 25). He was recognized as an expert in organ construction and was called upon throughout his life to inspect new organs.

Scheidt's flourishing life at court came to an abrupt end in 1625, when Christian Wilhelm left to join King Christian IV of Denmark to do battle on the Protestant side in the Thirty Years War. Although Scheidt retained his title he received no salary, and most of his musicians obtained employment elsewhere. Halle suffered severely during the war; it changed hands several times and by the end had lost fully half of its population. Yet through the trials of war and the great decline in his professional prestige, Scheidt remained remarkably loyal to Halle, and on 15 April 1627 he married, even though he was unemployed. He was paid that year for some compositions that he had sent to the Stuttgart court, and then and later he must also have derived income from his teaching. Of his many pupils the most famous was Adam Krieger. In 1628 the city created a new post for him, director musices, with responsibility for the music in the most important church, the Marktkirche. He immediately set to work purchasing new music, supervising the rebuilding of the organ, strengthening the city's instrumental ensemble and composing many large vocal works in the concerted style. But this second flourishing period also came to an abrupt end, because of a dispute between him and Christian Gueinz, Rektor of the Gymnasium. Both claimed jurisdiction over the choirboys, all of whom were also pupils at the Gymnasium. The situation came to a total impasse on Easter Sunday 1630, when there was no vocal music at all in the church. Gueinz proved the more eloquent, and Scheidt was forced to give up his position. He continued to provide music on commission for weddings, however, and this led to a complaint in 1634 by the Marktkirche organist, Johannes Zahn, that he was impinging on his prerogatives. A compromise was found whereby Scheidt could continue but would have to give part of his income to Zahn. The low point in his life was reached in 1636, when the plague hit Halle, carrying away all four of his surviving children within a month. During these years he nevertheless continued to publish music. The final volume of the Ludi musici appeared in 1627, and between 1631 and 1640 he published four volumes of Geistliche Concerte, which were probably reduced versions of larger works he had composed earlier for the court and the Marktkirche. Two further volumes were projected but did not appear.

In 1638 peace returned to Halle; the new administrator, Duke August of Saxony, was able to move there, and Scheidt could once again enjoy his position as court Kapellmeister in fact as well as in name. The duke's arrival was celebrated by a service at the cathedral for which Scheidt composed the music, including a polychoral Te Deum (lost). He and his wife also began a new family. Although the music at court did not regain its pre-war level during his lifetime, he continued to compose and publish music. In 1642 he offered to Duke August of Brunswick a set of over 100 sacred madrigals for five voices and a set of instrumental sinfonias for use as preludes to vocal music. The madrigals are lost, but the sinfonias appeared in print two years later, dedicated to his own duke and thanking him for listening to his music 'with particularly diligent attention and most gracious approval'. (The duke was probably more interested in opera, however, and he built an opera house at Halle soon after Scheidt's death.) Scheidt's final publication was the so-called Görlitzer Tabulatur-Buch of 1650, a collection of 100 chorales for organ, harmonized in four parts. In 1647 he was conveyed in great honour and style to Gera by their town council to inspect a new organ, but his last surviving letters, from 1652, show him ignored by the burgomaster of Bittersfeld, who was a former pupil. His wife died on 5 May 1652; a second edition of the Görlitzer Tabulatur-Buch planned for 1653 did not appear, and he died on Good Friday 1654.

Printz singled out Schütz, Schein and Scheidt as the three best German composers of their time. They were all born between 1585 and 1587, worked in close geographical proximity and knew one another; Schein chose Scheidt as godfather to his daughter Susanna in 1623. Of the three, Scheidt was the only one to distinguish himself as an instrumental performer and the only one whose fame now rests on his instrumental music. He was also the one most devoted to the German chorale and the least adventurous, both in his personal life and in his compositional style.

2. Instrumental works

(i) Keyboard music. The most important source for Scheidt's keyboard music is the three-volume Tabulatura nova (1624). Its title signifies that it was the first German publication of keyboard music to appear in open score (fig.1) rather than in the letter notation of German organ tablature or the two six-line staves used in England and the Netherlands. This format emphasizes the contrapuntal and pedagogical nature of the music, beginning a tradition that persisted up to Bach's Art of Fugue. Far from being simply an intellectual exercise, however, this mostly unsystematic assortment of sacred and secular music clearly originated in the practical demands of Scheidt's work as court organist, and he expected organists to copy it back into tablature for use in performance.

In each of the first two volumes variation sets predominate; the tunes on which they are based are almost equally divided between sacred and secular. Scheidt's variation technique is somewhat different for the two types. The eight sacred sets are all based on 16th-century Lutheran chorales, with the cantus firmus set apart in one voice, usually unornamented. Scheidt specified that on an organ with two manuals and pedal this voice should be played on the Rückpositiv, 'with a piercing sound, so that the chorale can be heard more distinctly', or on the pedal, using a 4′ stop if the chorale is in the alto. Within each set of variations there is great variety in the number of voices (from two to four), placing of the cantus firmus and treatment of the other voices. These are in free counterpoint, sometimes related to the chorale, and use many types of idiomatic keyboard figuration, often subjecting short motifs to extensive sequential repetition. There is always a fine sense of structure, sometimes resulting in a symmetrical arrangement of the individual variations. The seven secular variation sets are based on dances and songs from the Netherlands, France and England. Here the cantus firmus is more often decorated, and even when it is not it is absorbed into the surrounding texture, suitable for performance on a one-manual instrument, such as a positive organ, harpsichord or clavichord. The melody is more often in the upper voice, the texture more often homophonic, and while the types of figuration are similar to those in the sacred variations there is a greater use of small note values. The remaining pieces in these two volumes are for the most part freely contrapuntal.

1. Fantasia 'Io son ferito lasso' from Scheidt's 'Tabulatura nova', i (Hamburg: Michael Hering, 1624)

The third volume differs from the other two both in its systematic organization and in its total exclusion of secular music. It contains precisely those parts of the liturgy that an organist in Halle was required to play, either throughout the year or for a liturgical season, namely the Kyrie, Gloria, Credo and communion hymn (Jesus Christus unser Heiland) for Mass and the seasonal Latin hymns, Magnificat and Benedicamus for Vespers. The hymn settings are variation sets similar to those in the preceding volumes, with the addition of another method of cantus firmus treatment, in which each phrase of the chorale is treated imitatively in all voices. Scheidt used this method systematically for the first variation, and it is the vehicle for some of his best chorale settings. Canonic counterpoint in the free voices also appears only in the third volume. Although all of these techniques appear in the Magnificat settings (one for each of the nine tones), they are not strictly speaking variation sets but alternatim settings of the even verses. The Kyrie, Gloria and Credo are settings of an entire cantus firmus, while the Benedicamus and a similar piece, Modus ludendi, are short pieces designed to end the service with the full organ in six parts with double pedal. Scheidt also specified double pedal as one method of playing the tenor and bass voices of a sacred variation with cantus firmus in the alto, an indication of his own high skill as a performer.

The first volume of the Tabulatura nova was dedicated to Duke Johann Georg of Saxony, and the other two to the councils of several cities; Schütz at Dresden was consulted as to its value, as was Johann Staden at Nuremberg, and both commended it. Widespread manuscript copies, particularly in southern Germany, further attest to its good reception, yet Scheidt published no further organ music until 1650. The Tabulatur-Buch hundert geistlicher Lieder und Psalmen published at Görlitz is also in open score but is entirely different in that it comprises quite simple four-part settings of German chorales. These settings are clearly related to the four-part vocal harmonizations found in hymnals of the time, especially Schein's Cantional of 1627. All but 13 of Scheidt's chorales are found in Schein's collection in much the same order, arranged according to the church year and Luther's catechism. But Scheidt's settings were explicitly for organ; they are more contrapuntal, and he stated in the foreword that they were 'for organists to play with Christian congregations' (in alternation, according to Mahrenholz, and not as accompaniment). The organ pieces by Scheidt surviving in manuscript do not add substantially to his published work.

Scheidt inherited many of his stylistic traits from Sweelinck, especially his cultivation of variation form, his preference for contrapuntal writing and many of the motifs in his keyboard figuration. He has often been grouped (most recently by Apel) with Sweelinck's other German pupils, such as Andreas Düben, Jacob Praetorius (ii), Scheidemann and their followers, as a member of the so-called north German school of organ composition. But this is to overlook the fact that some striking features of their music – expressively ornamented chorale melodies, strong textural contrasts, cultivation of virtuosity in the toccata and prelude and above all a love of fantasy that is bold and often daring – are conspicuously absent from Scheidt's much more rationally conceived keyboard music. His great strength lay in the contrapuntal treatment of the chorale, and his music is much more akin to the chorale fugue cultivated in central Germany and ultimately to Bach's canonic variations on Vom Himmel hoch. See also CHORALE SETTINGS, §II, 2.

(ii) Ensemble music. Little of Scheidt's music for instrumental ensemble is extant. Of the four volumes of Ludi musici, only the first (1621) survives complete; two partbooks of Part ii (1622) and one of Part iv (1627) are extant, while Part iii has disappeared completely, its title known only from the Fair catalogues of 1625. These subsequent volumes seem to be similar in content to the first, which contains a varied assortment of pavanes, galliards, allemandes, courantes and canzonas and one intrada, all scored for four or five instruments with a continuo part extracted from the instrumental bass. Scheidt indicated that they were composed for viols but allowed the use of other instruments; at least one canzona (no.18) is scored for cornetts, and the Galliard battaglia is dedicated to the court cornettist. The presence of a continuo part makes them more forward-looking than Schein's Banchetto musicale (1617); they are not, however, arranged in suites like Schein's collection, and the keys of the individual dances allow for only occasional pairing. The texture is more often homophonic than contrapuntal, although there is a high degree of motivic interplay between the parts; the five-part pieces often approximate to a polychoral texture through alternation of the top two parts. Six canzonas based on secular tunes are of particular interest, for they show a different aspect of Scheidt's variation technique whereby he used the theme as a point of departure rather than as a cantus firmus. He obviously composed the Ludi musici as dinner music and light entertainment in his capacity as court Kapellmeister. His only other instrumental publication, LXX Symphonien (1644), is also incomplete; the second cantus part is missing, and the one appearing in Werke, xiii, was written by the editors. Scheidt did not intend these short pieces in trio texture to be performed as independent instrumental music but offered them instead as introductions or ritornellos for vocal concertos; he had probably composed them as part of his unpublished large vocal concertos.

3. CANONS. Scheidt's canons are on the borderline between instrumental and vocal music. The 12 canons in the first part of the Tabulatura nova were probably included more for pedagogical purposes than as pieces for performance; all but one are based on sacred tunes, and some seem intended for voices rather than organ. No.10 was also printed at the beginning, beneath Scheidt's portrait, with the text 'In te Domine speravi, non confundar in aeternum' (fig.2). This must have been a personal motto, for he set it several times. Other canons by him survive in manuscript sources, including one, Laudate Dominum in chordis et organo, which formed part of the decoration of the rebuilt Moritzkirche organ. Scheidt is one of a long tradition of German composers, among them Schlick, Buxtehude, Theile and Bach, who cultivated these musical-intellectual puzzles. His favourite canonic techniques are contrary motion and close canon against a cantus firmus; the latter type is also integrated into his organ and vocal music.

4. VOCAL WORKS. Scheidt published seven collections of vocal music between 1620 and 1640, all of it sacred. Three different genres are represented: the motet, the large polychoral concerto with instruments and the small concerto for a few voices and continuo. The concerto principle pervades even the motets, and there is a remarkable similarity of compositional technique in all three types.

Scheidt's first publication of any kind was the Cantiones sacrae (1620), a collection of motets for eight voices. As with Schein's Cymbalum Sionium (1615), this collection appeared at the time of his appointment as court Kapellmeister; the dedication to Christian Wilhelm of Brandenburg and the title-pages of the soprano and bass parts describe Scheidt only as court organist, while the other parts include his position as Kapellmeister. Again like Cymbalum Sionium it is a collection of polychoral motets without continuo, with both Latin and German texts, and, as first publications of sacred music, both probably contain works composed over a number of years. In Scheidt's case all but one of the motets are scored for a double choir, either two groups of soprano, alto, tenor and bass or two sopranos, alto and tenor, and alto, tenor and two basses. While only one motet specifies instruments (two clarinos in In dulci jubilo) and all eight voices are texted, it does not necessarily follow that Scheidt intended these pieces for purely vocal performance. Some of the bass parts lie too low for the human voice (e.g. in Surrexit pastor bonus), and it is quite likely that Scheidt envisaged further instrumental participation in the form both of an organ accompaniment derived from the lowest voice of each choir and of substitution or doubling by instruments.

The style of Scheidt's motets is a lively mixture of traditional German elements, the Dutch influence of his teacher Sweelinck (whose own Cantiones sacrae had appeared in 1619), and the Italian concerto style as mediated by Michael Praetorius, with whom he had worked in 1616 and 1618. Nearly half of the collection is devoted to settings of German chorales. These are typically restricted to one stanza, beginning with two motet-style expositions of the first phrase, one for each choir, and proceeding to a much closer interchange between choirs, often echoing very short motifs. Two settings per omnes versus (Christe, der du bist Tag und Licht and Vater unser im Himmelreich) are similar for the first stanza but continue through the following verses in the manner of the organ variations: two to four voices, strictly contrapuntal, with the cantus firmus in long notes restricted to one voice. There are clear similarities between these two motets and Scheidt's organ settings of the same chorales in the Tabulatura nova. The fact that the organ pieces were published four years later does not necessarily mean that they were also composed later; the reverse is perhaps more likely. The final stanza in each motet restores all eight voices, homophonically and in triple time, a practice reminiscent of the final section of the keyboard variations on secular tunes.

The texts of the other German motets are all taken from Luther's translation of the Bible and include five complete psalms. The style is similar to that of the single-verse chorale settings, but without a cantus firmus Scheidt was able to give greater attention to details of text-setting; he used both word-painting and sectional contrast of metre and texture to express the meaning of the text. He wrote Zion spricht for the funeral of his father, who died on 15 August 1618 (his brother Gottfried's setting of the same text is also included in this collection as no.35). One third of the collection is devoted to settings of Latin texts, all liturgical antiphons and responsories with the exception of O Domine Jesu Christe, a devotional text taken from Andreas Musculus's Precationes that had also been set by Giovanni Gabrieli (1597) and H.L. Hassler (1601); Erhard Bodenschatz had included Gabrieli's motet in his Florilegium Portense (1603), and Scheidt was undoubtedly familiar with both earlier settings. The other Latin pieces include many concerto-like elements, especially Quaerite primum regnum Dei, where the same verse (Luke xii.31) is stated five times, the second half as a refrain, homophonic and in triple time, the first half different each time in a highly contrasting florid and contrapuntal style.

The possibilities for concerto-style performance latent in the Cantiones sacrae are made explicit and expanded in Scheidt's next publication, Pars prima concertuum sacrorum (1622). Two of the 12 concertos are in fact reworkings of motets from the Cantiones sacrae, and the revisions are not extensive: addition of a continuo and instrumental sinfonias at the beginning and in the middle and instrumental doublings specified for the tutti passages. In the newly composed concertos the duet and trio writing, already present in the Cantiones sacrae, increases in both extent and virtuosity, and the instrumental participation includes obbligato parts as well as sinfonias and doublings. There is a marked shift in content compared with the Cantiones sacrae: there are no chorale settings, and the only German text is the psalm Herr unser Herrscher, which is the model for the Missa brevis that follows it.

Scheidt intended to publish further volumes of large concertos, but he apparently never found a publisher for them. The four volumes entitled Geistliche Concerte that he did publish (between 1631 and 1640) are all scored for a few voices (mostly three) and accompanied only by continuo. They also differ in content from the 1622 volume, with only a handful of Latin texts and the chief emphasis on the German chorale. Even so their compositional technique is similar to that of the large concertos. Once again there are two arrangements of works published in the earlier collection, Herr unser Herrscher and Hodie completi sunt. The reduction is one of length as well as of number of voices, and instrumental sinfonias and doublings are omitted. The solo section of the large concerto can be taken over virtually intact, sometimes with a slight reduction in virtuosity, but the tutti sections are cut extensively. The solo–tutti effect is nevertheless maintained by the contrast between counterpoint and homophony that appears in many of the small concertos.

In the second part (1634) Scheidt published an index of all six projected volumes of small concertos, at the end of which he said:

> The above sacred concertos, which can be performed thus with a few vocal parts, have also been composed by me in other volumes, namely with eight and 12 voices, two, three and four choruses, with symphonies and all sorts of instruments. ... Whoever would like to publish and print them, to the glory of God, can get them from me at any time.

Mahrenholz interpreted this to mean that the original form of all the small concertos was a large concerto, a theory disputed by Gessner (pp.80ff). While there are some small concertos that do suggest that they are in their original form, reduction seems more likely in most of them, and five of the titles listed for Part v are also in the 1622 volume of large concertos.

A number of the small concertos are based on the same chorales as appeared in the Cantiones sacrae, but there is very little similarity between the two settings. This can be explained by the fact that it is the tutti sections of the large concertos that the motets most closely resemble – precisely those sections that must be cut to form the small concertos. Moreover, the eight voices of the motets most often form only two distinct bodies of sound, whereas the small concertos usually work with three bodies of sound (each a solo voice), supported by continuo; they are much more contrapuntal and tightly constructed. The texts of Parts i–ii and iv of the Geistliche Concerte are a mixture of chorales and biblical passages, most of them rather general in nature. By contrast, Part iii is made up almost entirely of chorale settings, arranged systematically according to the church year. There are also Magnificat settings for Christmas, Easter and Pentecost, with German interpolations appropriate to the season between the even verses. Braun has shown that some of these interpolations, as well as other concertos here, are parodies of older motets by other composers. Many of the chorale concertos are settings of more than one stanza of the chorale and are divided into two or three parts, with individual stanzas distinguished by scoring and compositional technique (e.g. Nun komm der Heiden Heiland). They are thus reminiscent of the variation cycles in the Tabulatura nova, with the cantus firmus treated less rigidly, but they also look ahead to the later chorale cantata.

The Liebliche Krafft-Blümlein (1635) is an early example of the numerous 17th-century prints bearing flowery titles. All 12 concertos are scored for two voices and continuo; they are mostly shorter and more intimate than those in the Geistliche Concerte. All but one are based on short Old Testament texts; the exception is the chorale Herzlich tut mich erfreuen. This, together with the setting in Part iv of the Geistliche Concerte, may be a reduction from a lost large concerto, but the others appear to be in their original form. See also CHORALE SETTINGS, §I, 3.

5. CONCLUSION. Scheidt shared with Handel a propensity to rework musical material, both his own and that of other composers. No genre of his compositions is totally independent: dances from the Ludi musici turn up in the Tabulatura nova, similar chorale settings and canons are found in both the organ and vocal music, and the distinctions between motet, large concerto and small concerto are blurred. He wrote idiomatically for both voices and instruments, however, a feature particularly evident in his keyboard music. Nevertheless certain stylistic elements unify the entire corpus of his music: a love of variation, particularly of the German chorale, a strong sense of structure, his skilful cultivation of counterpoint, especially in sacred music, and above all the interchange of short motifs, derived from the concerto, which pervades all his music, whether contrapuntal or homophonic, instrumental or vocal.

KERALA J. SNYDER, DOUGLAS BUSH

Scheiffelhut [Scheiffelhuet], Jakob [Jacob] (b Augsburg, bap. 19 May 1647; d Augsburg, 2 July 1709). German composer and instrumentalist. He received his musical education in Augsburg at the choir school attached to St Anna, the leading Protestant church there, and from a Stadtpfeifer called Franck. He was for many years a member of the Augsburg guild of Stadtpfeifer and played at weddings and other festivities. In 1673 he was appointed to play both wind and string instruments at the St Anna choir school, to give instrumental lessons and to compose occasional works. In 1694 he was appointed assistant to Georg Schmezer, the director of music there, and after Schmezer's death in July 1697 he applied unsuccessfully to succeed him. Instead he became choirmaster of the Barfüsserkirche and remained there until his death. He was much admired as a teacher. His reputation as a composer rests mainly on his instrumental works.

These comprise suites which reflect the pronounced French influence cultivated in music at Augsburg at the time, and they were performed far beyond Augsburg too. Scheiffelhut's most important religious music is contained in his volume of 1682, which consists entirely of settings of texts by Narziss Rauner.

ADOLF LAYER

Schein, Johann Hermann (b Grünhain, nr Annaberg [now Annaberg-Bucholz], 20 Jan 1586; d Leipzig, 19 Nov 1630). German composer and poet. He was an important predecessor of Bach, both as Leipzig Thomaskantor and as a gifted composer. He was one of the first composers to graft the style of the Italian madrigal, monody and concerto on to the traditional elements of Lutheran church music.

1. Life. 2. Vocal works: (i) Sacred music (ii) Secular music (iii) Occasional music. 3. Instrumental works.

1. Life. After the death of his father, a pastor and former schoolmaster, in 1593, Schein's family moved to Dresden, whence they had originally come. There, at the age of 13, he was taken into the Hofkapelle of the Elector of Saxony as a soprano. Already grounded in the principles of music, he received further instruction in both theoretical and practical music from the Kapellmeister, Rogier Michael, and became acquainted with an extensive repertory of both secular and sacred choral music in Latin, German and Italian. He distinguished himself not only in music but in his other studies as well, and following a brief matriculation at the University of Leipzig he was admitted on 18 May 1603 to Schulpforta, an electoral school near Naumburg that specialized in music and the humanities. He arrived there just after Erhard Bodenschatz had ceased to be its Kantor. Bodenschatz had compiled his famous motet collection Florilegium Portense (1618[1]–1621[2]; the first part appeared in a different form and with a different title, 1603[1]) for the edification of the students, who sang the motets before and after meals. Schein must have been thoroughly familiar with this repertory, though he was actually taught music by Bodenschatz's successors, first Bartholomäus Scheer and then, from 1606, Martin Roth. He left Schulpforta on 26 April 1607, returned to Dresden and in 1608 enrolled at the University of Leipzig, with an electoral scholarship, to study law and the liberal arts; he remained there for four years. The Thomaskantor at this time was Sethus Calvisius, who had preceded Bodenschatz as Kantor at Schulpforta. Schein's first publication, Venus Kräntzlein, appeared in 1609.

In 1613 Schein went to Weissenfels to become house music director and tutor to the children of Gottfried von Wolffersdorff, a friend from his Schulpforta days who soon recommended him for his first purely musical position, as Kapellmeister to Duke Johann Ernst the Younger at Weimar. He took up this post on 21 May 1615. On 12 February 1616 he married his first wife Sidonia, a native of Dresden and daughter of the district Rentsekretär Eusebius Hösel; they must have known each other from childhood for the two families had long been acquainted, and three of Schein's poems for the Venus Kräntzlein have acrostics spelling her name. Of the five children of this marriage only the elder son survived into adulthood. Schein's tenure at Weimar was happy but short. On 19 August 1616 he was called to Leipzig to audition for the position of Thomaskantor, which had been vacant since the death of Calvisius the previous November. He was accepted, began work in late September or early October and was immediately plunged into a dispute with the Konrektor, who was jealous of the Kantor's prestige and salary and especially of the extra income he received for wedding and funeral music. In addition to his responsibilities of directing the choral music in the Thomaskirche and the Nicolaikirche, Schein was required to teach 14 hours a week in the Thomasschule – ten hours of Latin grammar and syntax and four of singing. His most illustrious pupils were the poet Paul Fleming and possibly the composer Heinrich Albert, whose continuo arias show the influence of his Musica boscareccia.

Schein's wife died as a result of complications of childbirth on 30 June 1624; his song Sei fröhlich, meine Seele was performed at the funeral on 2 July. He remarried on 22 February 1625; his new bride was Elizabeth von der Perre, daughter of a painter who had worked on the decoration of the organ in the Nicolaikirche. At least four of the five children of this marriage also died in infancy. In addition to the sorrows in his family life Schein suffered from poor health: he was afflicted with tuberculosis, gout, scurvy and kidney stones. Illness forced him to cancel the performance of a large work composed for the Reformation Jubilee of 1617 and postponed the publication of the first part of Opella nova; it also appears to have sapped his creative energy from about 1626. Two visits to the springs at Carlsbad were of no avail, and he died at the age of 44. Johann Höpner, pastor of the Nicolaikirche, preached at his funeral, and the sermon (reprinted in Spitta) includes an account of his life that provides valuable biographical information. His successor as Thomaskantor was Tobias Michael, son of Rogier Michael.

As late as 1691, W.C. Printz still identified Schütz, Schein and Scheidt as the leading German composers of their time. They were all born between 1585 and 1587, worked in close geographical proximity and knew one another. The closest friendship was between Schein and Schütz; Schütz visited Schein on his deathbed and at his request composed a motet on the text Das ist je gewisslich wahr (published separately (SWV277) in 1631 and revised (SWV388) in Schütz's Geistliche Chor-Music, 1648). There are many parallels in the early careers of these two composers, born within four months and 80 km of each other. They both began as choirboys with a talent that attracted the attention of a nobleman who supported their education, both studied law and, as composers, both distinguished themselves through the expressive setting of Luther's biblical language for a few voices with instrumental accompaniment. Several obvious differences help to account for the greater importance that history has accorded Schütz: extensive international travel, including his periods of study in Italy; more prestigious appointments; better health and much longer life.

2. VOCAL WORKS. Schein was first and foremost a composer for the voice, and he was equally devoted to sacred and secular music. In the foreword to the Banchetto musicale (1617) he announced his intention to publish music for worship and for social gatherings in regular alternation, and he maintained this practice throughout the productive years that followed. The stylistic categories of his music cut across the boundary between sacred and secular: in each case there is an early choral work without continuo (Cymbalum Sionium and Venus Kräntzlein), and several collections of concertos for a few voices and continuo (Opella nova and Musica boscareccia) framing a collection of continuo madrigals (Fontana d'Israel or Israelis Brünlein and Diletti pastorali). Although the musical techniques are similar, the sacred works are the more expressively intense.

(i) Sacred music. Schein sent his first collection of sacred music, Cymbalum Sionium, to the publisher in April 1615, just before he took up his duties as Kapellmeister at Weimar. The texts of these 30 motets are mostly biblical and are evenly divided between Latin and German. The music shows a greater stylistic variety than any of Schein's other collections, suggesting that he had written them over a period of perhaps ten years, as far back as his student days at Schulpforta. A number of them are closely related stylistically to motets by Bodenschatz, Calvisius, Handl and Lassus contained in the Florilegium Portense. Others, particularly those set to German texts, are in a more progressive style, less contrapuntal and with closer attention to details of word-setting. The scoring ranges from five vocal parts (two sopranos, alto, tenor and bass) to polychoral works in eight and 12 parts.

The publication of the first part of Opella nova in 1618 marked a decisive turning-point in Schein's style. It was his first collection of sacred concertos with continuo, and it is one of the most important early examples of the genre in Germany. The contents are modelled to some extent on Viadana's Cento concerti ecclesiastici (1602), which had been printed in Germany in 1609 and was perhaps even more influential there than in Italy. Schein referred the continuo player to Viadana for instructions in realizing the bass. His concertos, however, depart significantly from Viadana's in that most of them are based on Lutheran chorales. In most cases the cantus firmus is fragmented and tossed back and forth between two sopranos over an instrumental bass; five concertos for major feasts have a tenor part with the chorale in complete phrases and longer notes. Although Schein's introduction states that the bass may be played either with a bass instrument (trombone, bassoon, viola grossa) or a harmony instrument (organ, harpsichord, theorbo), there are two separate bass parts, and it is quite clear that the concertos were conceived with realization of the bass in mind. In the preface to the second part of Opella nova (1626) he noted that where only one voice is singing it is best to have two realizing instruments, a plucked instrument in addition to the organ. The second part differs noticeably from the first in both content and scoring. Only a third of the pieces are based on chorales, in settings generally similar to those of the first book; the majority are now biblical texts set in a variety of ways, including solo voice with obbligato instruments and solo–tutti contrasts. Freed from their reliance on chorale melodies, the concertos are longer, more richly scored, and much more expressive of the text. The Annunciation dialogue Maria, gegrüsset seist du, Holdselige is among the finest examples of early Baroque biblical monody in Germany.

Schein had already risen to expressive heights in sacred music with the 1623 publication of Fontana d'Israel or Israelis Brünlein, a collection of pieces composed 'in a special, graceful Italian madrigal manner'. The texts are mostly from the Old Testament, and all but one are set for five voices (two sopranos, alto, tenor and bass) and continuo. The title-page states that they can be performed 'either alone with singers and instruments or with organ or harpsichord' (fig.2). The continuo is not really necessary: it is a basso seguente doubling the lowest sounding part, and there are seldom fewer than three voices singing. The 'madrigal manner' refers to the particular care with which each phrase of text is set, though this is done more with the musical-rhetorical figures of the musica poetica of German humanism than with the extreme word-painting of the Italian madrigal. Schein's madrigals are also less contrapuntal than classical Italian madrigals, and on numerous occasions he split the voices into two groups, with the alto participating in both. His use of unusual intervals and dissonant harmonic figures, especially the diminished 4th, is more frequent in this collection than any other. It ranks with Schütz's Geistliche Chor-Music as one of the masterpieces of early Baroque choral music in Germany.

Schein's last collection of sacred music was the Cantional. The tradition of arranging Lutheran hymns in four-part harmony with the melody in the soprano had begun with Lucas Osiander in 1586 and had flourished in the meantime. Schein's collection superseded the Harmonia cantionum ecclesiasticarum brought out by Calvisius, his predecessor as Thomaskantor, in 1597. It was the largest to date and included most of the hymns in use in Leipzig at the time, arranged according to liturgical usage or occasion. He was the first to introduce continuo figures into the bass part for the use of 'organists, instrumentalists and lutenists'. In assembling the Cantional he assumed various roles: editor, arranger, author and composer. For most of the hymns he wrote new harmonizations, sometimes making minor changes (often chromatic) in the melody, sometimes replacing an existing melody with a new one of his own. In addition there are 41 hymns with text, melody and setting by Schein himself. Most of them are either psalm paraphrases or funeral hymns or songs, five (nos.245–9) for members of his own family. In 1645 Tobias Michael, Schein's successor as Thomaskantor, prepared a second edition of the Cantional, adding 22 more funeral pieces by Schein and four of his own. Although many of Schein's hymns were taken into later hymnals in the 17th and 18th centuries, only one is still in general use, Mach's mit mir Gott nach deiner Güt, based on an earlier melody and first published with Schein's text as a funeral piece in 1628. See also CHORALE SETTINGS, §I, 3.

(ii) Secular music. Schein wrote his own texts for all of his secular music. His first collection, Venus Kräntzlein, was published while he was still a student at the University of Leipzig and certainly reflects the informal music-making of the students. The 17 vocal pieces mainly follow in the tradition of the German folksong in both text and music. All but one are in five parts (two sopranos, alto, tenor and bass) and in a simple homophonic style with the melody in the top voice. They are short, syllabic settings in binary form with little text repetition, stylistically indebted to Hans Leo Hassler's Lustgarten (1601) and with scarcely a hint of the individuality of Schein's later works.

Musica boscareccia or Wald-Liederlein appeared in three parts (in 1621, 1626 and 1628), which are all similar in style. These were by far the most popular of Schein's collections, appearing in numerous reprints as late as 1643 and finally in the form of sacred contrafacta by Eckhardt Leichner under the title Musica boscareccia sacra (1644–51). The texts represent a great change from the Venus Kräntzlein in both content and style. The poems are populated by a cast of characters taken from the Italian pastoral tradition: the shepherds and shepherdesses Corydon and Phyllis, Mirtillo and Delia, and the deities Amor or Cupid, Phoebus, Pan and Venus. The literary style is dominated by rhetorical figures such as exclamation, repetition and metaphor, frequently combined with a corresponding musical figure. The settings are all for two sopranos and a bass that is both texted and figured. In his preface Schein outlined six ways of performing them, ranging from three singers without continuo or with various vocal and instrumental combinations to one soprano accompanied only by continuo. They thus belong to two traditions, the late Italian villanella, as Schein acknowledged on the title-page, and the few-voiced concerto. The same scoring for two sopranos and bass is found frequently in the first part of Opella nova; the two soprano parts are treated in much the same way in both collections, but the bass part in Musica boscareccia is more vocal in character and more closely linked motivically with the upper voices, often in parallel 3rds or 10ths.

Schein's Diletti pastorali or Hirten Lust (1624) is the first published collection of German continuo madrigals, the secular counterpart to Fontana d'Israel or Israelis Brünlein, which had appeared the previous year. The poetry is similar to that of Musica boscareccia but with an even closer reliance on the Italian pastoral tradition, extending to a close imitation of actual metrical and rhyme schemes used by Tasso and Guarini. The music is naturally much lighter than that of Fontana d'Israel but is similar in texture; the madrigals are scored for five voices (two sopranos, alto, tenor and bass) and continuo, and, though Schein gave no instructions as to performance, the continuo is equally dispensable. The most important change compared with Musica boscareccia is the abandonment of strophic form; this enabled him to set each phrase of a text specifically, without having to worry about how the music would fit succeeding strophes. Poet and composer are more completely integrated here than in any of his other collections, and Rauhe has catalogued a large number of both rhetorical and musical figures that relate to one another in a variety of ways.

The Studenten-Schmauss (1626) interrupts the regular alternation of secular and sacred collections and represents a reversion to the style of the Venus Kräntzlein. It consists of five simple and delightful drinking-songs for five voices (two sopranos, alto, tenor and bass), with the vocal bass figured. In their earthiness they serve to underline the degree to which the sacred and the secular were intertwined in Schein's work.

(iii) Occasional music. Schein was commissioned to compose music for numerous occasions, mainly weddings and funerals. Following the custom of the time these pieces were published separately in a small edition, and a number of these prints, which extend from 1617 to 1630, still survive. In many cases the piece was later published in one of the collections, often in revised form and sometimes completely re-composed: surviving concordances indicate that the funeral music was mainly taken into the Cantional and the wedding music into Musica boscareccia or Diletti pastorali. The wedding pieces could be either sacred or secular. Although most of them are secular trios similar to Musica boscareccia, there are large polychoral settings of psalm texts as well. Schein stated in the preface to Fontana d'Israel that many of its contents were originally occasional works; although none has survived in a separate print, many of the texts are suitable for a wedding or a funeral. The same can be said of Cymbalum Sionium. The earliest surviving funeral piece, Ich will schweigen, composed in 1617 for the funeral of Dorothea, Duchess of Saxony, anticipates the style of Fontana d'Israel. Schein also composed music for other occasions, such as the yearly inauguration of the new town council. One such piece, Exaudiat te, Dominus, was composed for the inauguration of the new Rektor of the university in 1624 and two years later was taken into the second part of Opella nova.

3. INSTRUMENTAL WORKS. Instrumental music accounts for only a small portion of Schein's output. Nevertheless, his one instrumental collection, the Banchetto musicale (1617), marks a highpoint in the history of the variation suite. Though he did not call them suites, there are 20 numbered groups of 'pavanes, galliards, courantes and allemandes, which are arranged so that they correspond to one another in both mode and invention', to quote Schein's own description. There is also a tripla following each allemande, but it is clear from both the title and the layout of the page that Schein did not consider this a separate movement. Variation takes place on two levels in these suites. The tripla is a strict proportio to the allemande, a simple reworking of the same music in triple time. The other three movements also share musical motifs with the allemande, but here the relationship is much freer and there is no bar-for-bar correspondence. Although the immediate predecessor of Schein's collection was Paul Peuerl's Newe Padouan, Intrada, Däntz unnd Galliarda (1611), both are clearly rooted in the duple–triple dance pairs of the 16th century. Schein's suites are actually the combination of two such pairs, pavan–galliard and allemande–tripla, separated by a single courante. The allemande and tripla are close to actual dance music, four-part, homophonic and folklike in style; the pavan and galliard are in five parts, stylized and contrapuntal; the courante holds an intermediate position, in 6/4 time but with little of the hemiola that was to characterize this dance later. The suites could be played 'on any instruments but preferably on viols' and were probably composed as dinner music at Weissenfels and Weimar. With its lack of a continuo part, the Banchetto musicale is the last of Schein's collections in the style of the prima prattica; the harmonic boldness of his later style is, however, already evident, and he announced here that his next publication (Opella nova, i) would contain a 'basso continuo ad organum'.

Schein's only other instrumental pieces are appended to his earlier vocal collections. The three canzonas, especially the one in Cymbalum Sionium, are comparable with those of Giovanni Gabrieli and are fine early examples of German instrumental fugal art.

Scheinpflug, Paul (b Loschwitz, nr Dresden, 10 Sept 1875; d Memel [now Klaipėda, Lithuania], 11 March 1937). German conductor and composer. He studied music at the Dresden Conservatory. For two years (1897–8) he was employed as a music teacher and violinist in the home of a Russian noble in Kiev, and from 1898 served as leader and choral director of the Bremen SO. From 1909 to 1914 he conducted the Musikverein orchestra in Königsberg, serving concurrently as director of the choruses at the music academy. He was city music director in Duisburg in the 1920s and then conductor of the Dresden PO (1929–33). In his later years he was a popular guest conductor with many orchestras. Scheinpflug's compositions stand in the mainstream of German music; Brahms was often his model, as is evident in the first movement of the Violin Sonata op.13.

Schelb, Josef (b Bad Krozingen, nr Freiburg, 14 March 1894; d Freiburg, 8 Feb 1977). German composer. After studying with Hans Huber, Barblan and others, he made concert tours of Europe and South America as accompanist to the violinist Juan Manén. From 1924 he taught at the Karlsruhe Conservatory, eventually becoming professor (1932–59). His music, which covers the full range of standard genres, was strongly influenced by Reger and by French Impressionism, although he also used 12-note techniques. The French Revolutionary setting of his opera Charlotte Corday prohibited its performance during the Nazi era.

FRIEDRICH BASER

Schelble, Johann Nepomuk (b Hüfingen, 16 May 1789; d Hüfingen, 6 Aug 1837). German singer, conductor and teacher. He was a choirboy at Obermarchtal, moving in 1803 to the Donaueschingen Gymnasium. His singing career from 1808 to 1814 centred on the Stuttgart court and opera house, where he sang tenor and baritone roles. From 1812 he also taught at the Stuttgart Royal Musical Institute, and in 1814 went to tour in German opera houses and in Vienna. The Frankfurt theatre engaged him from 1817 to 1819; he left because of ill-health. In 1818 he founded the Frankfurt Cäcilienverein. Built on the lines of the Berliner Sing-Akademie, it performed numerous choral works by Mozart, Handel, Palestrina, Scarlatti and others, and was highly regarded by critics. Schelble participated in the Bach revival, conducting the St Matthew Passion on 2 May 1829: unlike Mendelssohn, Schelble rewrote the recitatives in more 'polished' style. He conducted the Cäcilienverein up to the year of his death. Schelble developed a system of teaching young musicians rudiments and sight-singing that was later adapted by Lanz, Widmann and F.W. Rühle. His compositions chiefly comprise choral and vocal works, some chamber music and various teaching exercises.

DAVID CHARLTON

Schellbecken (Ger.). See CYMBALS.

Schelle, Johann (b Geising, Saxony, bap. 6 Sept 1648; d Leipzig, 10 March 1701). German composer. As Kantor of the Thomaskirche, Leipzig, he held one of the leading musical posts in Germany, and he was an important composer of sacred cantatas to German texts.

1. LIFE. Schelle was born into a respected musical family, his father being Kantor and schoolmaster at Geising. In 1655 he entered the choir of the Dresden electoral chapel under Schütz; two years later he was sent on to the ducal court at Wolfenbüttel, where Schütz was Kapellmeister in absentia at the time. He acquitted himself well there and, when his voice broke, continued his education in Leipzig, entering the Thomasschule under Knüpfer in 1665 and later attending the university. In October 1670 he took up the post of Kantor at nearby Eilenburg, having been recommended by Knüpfer as an accomplished performer, especially on the keyboard, with experience in teaching and composition. Schelle remained on friendly terms with Knüpfer (who was godfather to one of his children) and eventually succeeded him as Kantor of the Thomaskirche, Leipzig, on 31 January 1677. The post carried with it the office of Director chori musici for the city, responsibility for the music at the Nikolaikirche and also, after 1679, at the Paulinerkirche (on academic occasions), as well as teaching duties at the Thomasschule in music, Latin and catechism. In 1699 Schelle also applied for the post of Musikdirektor at the Neukirche in Leipzig, but it is not clear whether he was actually appointed.

Schelle's appointment was made against the wishes of the mayor, Lorenz von Adlershelm, who had supported Georg Bleyer, one of the 11 rival candidates, and who remained antagonistic to Schelle and to the changes he introduced into the musical content of services at the Thomaskirche. Matters came to a head when Schelle replaced the Latin compositions written by Italian masters, which were customarily performed after the morning Gospel, by music to German texts; the latter would often take the form of a cantata based on the Gospel reading, with the insertion of appropriate lied verses or other rhymed texts. Adlershelm instructed the Kantor to restore the Latin settings for the Christmas season of 1683, but his wish was overruled by the city council, who decided in favour of Schelle. The continuation of this practice being thus made possible, it became one of Schelle's most important achievements: he introduced into the Protestant liturgy in Leipzig not only the Gospel cantata to German texts but later the chorale cantata too. The chorale cantata was similarly intended to expound the teaching of the Gospel and was performed immediately after it; the sermon then took place, after which the same chorale would be sung by the whole congregation. This procedure was established through the joint efforts of Schelle and the pastor of the Thomaskirche, J.B. Carpzow. Schelle's setting of Vom Himmel kam der Engel Schar was probably intended for this kind of performance, since the chorale is kept intact and would have been easily recognized by the congregation. He seems to have played little part in the fierce theological controversies that took place at Leipzig in the 1680s between the orthodox Lutherans, led by Carpzow, and the Pietists, although he did reveal his sympathies with the latter by writing some of the melodies for Der andächtige Student, a collection of devotional hymns and prayers compiled by Joachim Feller. At the time of his death, the morale of the Thomasschule was in decline, undermined by a spirit of discontent and lack of discipline; while he was by no means solely responsible for this state of affairs, he did not leave an easy task for his successor and cousin, Johann Kuhnau. The university Rector read his funeral oration, and Kuhnau composed an obituary in his memory; both documents survive and contain valuable biographical information (see Richter, 1902).

2. WORKS. Schelle's compositions consist almost entirely of sacred works, most of them to German texts. Of the 167 titles listed by Schering (in DDT), relatively few survive and only a handful of motets were published in his lifetime. His annual cycle of cantatas, however, circulated widely in manuscript. The importance of his work lies in his development of the sacred cantata as he took it over from Knüpfer, and in his preference for modern and sometimes even experimental poetry. The basic, most common setting was for five-part choir (SSATB) accompanied by two violins, two violas and bassoon with continuo, but there are many examples of more elaborate scorings representing the magnificent fullness of sound that was one of the features of the Leipzig festival cantata. Schelle's cantatas aimed at popularity to a much greater extent than those of his predecessor, Knüpfer. He deliberately simplified the strict contrapuntal texture by frequently doubling the voices with instruments in the higher octave; thus, even in fully scored pieces, he rarely exceeded five real parts. Also, he regularly incorporated into his cantatas chorale harmonizations from Gottfried Vopelius's hymnal (Leipzig, 1682) that must have been familiar to the congregation. Finally, he used recitatives and arias that resemble contemporary German opera style. By these means he broadened the limits of the traditional church style, and by favouring stylistic diversity he distinguished himself from composers of the preceding generations and provided vital prerequisites for the development of the German church cantata in the early 18th century.

While the chorale cantatas are among Schelle's most brilliant and impressive works, it is the settings of Bible texts – mainly from the psalms and Gospels – that represent his most individual and profound achievements. Very few of the Gospel cantatas are extant; of the psalm settings, the most elaborate is the 26-part Lobe den Herren, presumably written for some important event in Leipzig. Set for three instrumental and two vocal groups (marked 'concertino' and 'da cappella'), the brilliance of sound is heightened by the use of a clarino quartet and two cornettinos. The choral writing reveals both contrapuntal mastery and a delight in massed, homophonic effects, often on a very simple harmonic basis. The impressively developed climaxes and the broad structure of the final fugue (a particular feature of Schelle) are effectively balanced by delicate and pictorial writing in the solo episodes. The structure of chorale cantatas such as Vom Himmel kam der Engel Schar, with its individual treatment of each verse, distinctive instrumental style, preservation of the chorale as a whole, and solo decoration of the melody, may well have influenced Bach in his later treatment of the form. Schelle also shared with Bach a deep awareness of the significance of the Bible text and a conscious desire to give it the fullest possible expression in his music.

Schelleng, John C(hristopher) (b 1892; d 1979). American engineer and acoustician. He had a distinguished professional career as an electrical engineer, specializing in research into radio wave transmission. In 1957 he retired from the directorship of radio research at Bell Telephone Laboratories. An enthusiastic amateur cellist, Schelleng undertook a programme of research into the acoustics of the violin family in his retirement. The combination of his musical experience and his background in electrical engineering resulted in a novel and extremely fruitful approach to the study of bowed string instruments, in which he drew an analogy between the exchange of vibrational energy between the string and the body of the instrument and the flow of electrical current round a circuit. His seminal paper, 'The Violin as a Circuit' (1963), provided the first realistic picture of how the violin functions as a whole, and became the foundation for most subsequent work in this area. Schelling was a pivotal figure in the group of researchers in violin acoustics which adopted the whimsical name Catgut Acoustical Society at his suggestion. He worked closely with Carleen Hutchins on the development of the Violin Octet, a set of new instruments based on the application of scaling theory to the violin. He was elected a fellow of the Acoustical Society of America in 1974.

Schelling, Ernest (Henry) (b Belvidere, NJ, 26 July 1876; d New York, 8 Dec 1939). American pianist, composer and conductor. Having made his début as a pianist in Philadelphia at the age of four, he studied with Mathias at the Paris Conservatoire (1882–5), and later with Moritz Moszkowski, Dionys Pruckner, Theodor Leschetizky, Hans Huber, Karl-Heinrich Barth and (after a rest from overwork) Paderewski (1898–1902). He toured extensively throughout Europe and South America, and returned permanently to the USA in 1905. In 1913 he was elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Although a successful and acclaimed pianist, he concentrated on composition after a car accident in 1919 injured his hands. Melodious, idiomatic and deftly orchestrated, his music is best represented by the once widely performed A Victory Ball, inspired by Alfred Noye's Armistice Day poem. In the 1920s Schelling turned to conducting; he was regular conductor of the Baltimore SO (1936–8), but is best known for his Young People's Concerts of the New York PO (1924–39).

KATHERINE K. PRESTON/MICHAEL MECKNA

Schelling, F(riedrich) W(ilhelm) J(oseph von) (b Leonberg, 27 Jan 1775; d Ragaz, 20 Aug 1854). German philosopher. He was the characteristic philosopher of German Romanticism, and had an unmatched influence on creative artists among his contemporaries. The composer most notably influenced by him was Weber, who was also a friend, as were Goethe, Hölderlin, Novalis and other outstanding figures of the German Romantic movement. It was Schelling who coined the aphorism that architecture is frozen music.

Because he was precocious and long-lived, his philosophy developed through various distinguishable phases. The most influential was his 'philosophy of nature', which he was propounding at the turn of the century. In it he pictured the world as an endlessly evolving organism, to be understood only in terms of its aim, which is the achievement of self-awareness. Man's emergence from nature is part of this process, so it is an error to think of spirit as being in direct opposition to nature; the two are basically one: nature is visible spirit, spirit invisible nature. Most importantly, the creative process is the same in both. The only difference between nature bringing forth an organism and a genius bringing forth a work of art (which is also to be seen as an organism, and to be understood teleologically) is that the latter acts consciously. However, this means that in great art spirit's awareness of itself and of its identity with nature (and therefore the self-awareness of the world as such) is achieved and manifested, and thus the ultimate purpose of the world's existence accomplished.

This philosophy was embraced by Romantic artists for two of its aspects: its identification of man with nature, the human spirit with natural forces; and its portrayal of art as the highest of all human activities.

Schemelli [Schemmel], Georg Christian (b Herzberg, *c*1676; d Zeitz, 5 March 1762). German musician. After singing in the court Kapelle at Dresden, he studied at the Thomasschule, Leipzig (1695–1700). He was employed as Kantor at Treuenbrietzen from 1707 and as court Kantor at Zeitz from 30 January 1727 until 1758, when he was succeeded by his son Christian Friedrich (1713–61). His only known publication, the Musicalisches Gesangbuch (Leipzig, 1736), dogmatically represents a compromise between Orthodox Lutheran and Pietist hymnbooks. It contains the texts of 954 hymns and includes engraved plates giving melody, figured bass and first verse or text incipit for 69 of these (ed. F. Rempp: J.S. Bach: Neue Ausgabe sämtlicher Werke, III/ii.1 (Kassel and Basle, 1991), 319–41). The volume was printed and published in Leipzig by B.C. Breitkopf but was unsuccessful; by 1760 copies were being sold off at 12 groschen. Three of the melodies have been attributed to Bach: Dir, dir, Jehova (autograph in Anna Magdalena's Clavierbüchlein of 1725); Komm, süsser Tod (for stylistic reasons); and Vergiss mein nicht (headed 'di S. Bach D.M. Lips.'). All three (BWV 452, 478 and 505) are arias rather than chorales. The preface indicates that all 69 melodies had 'in part, been newly composed completely, also, in part, improved in the basso continuo' by Bach. This is borne out by the presence of Bach's hand in the reproduction engravings, either throughout a given setting, in the bass only or in isolated passages in the bass.

Bach's second wife, Anna Magdalena, was from Zeitz and Schemelli may have met Bach during a visit there. He may also have made contact with Bach through his son, who studied at the Thomasschule from 1731 to 1734. By all accounts the son was a ne'er-do-well, but Bach wrote a favourable testimonial for him in 1740.

WALTER EMERY/GREGORY BUTLER

Schenck [Schenk], Johannes [Johann, Johan, Jan] (b Amsterdam, bap. 3 June 1660; d after 1710). Dutch composer and viol player of German descent. With the support of wealthy Amsterdam citizens he was able to publish his music in fine editions, which established him as perhaps the most important Dutch composer of the second half of the 17th century. His viol playing was extolled in numerous poems, one claiming that 'personne n'a touché a cet instrument avec plus de delicatesse que lui'. In about 1696 his fame secured him a post at the Düsseldorf court of the Elector Palatine Johann Wilhelm II, himself an amateur viol player. Schenck's career developed there as a court official too, culminating in 1710 in an appointment as chamber councillor. He was thus present at the coronation in 1711 of Emperor Charles VI at Frankfurt. He may have remained in the service of Johann Wilhelm until the latter's death in 1716.

Schenck's viol music constitutes one of the most important repertories composed for the instrument. It faithfully reflects the important stylistic changes taking place in northern Europe at the time, which may not always have worked to his advantage as a composer. His first published collection, the Tyd en konst-oeffeningen (1688), contains technically demanding sonatas, most of them followed by a suite. Their virtuosity seems to reflect the influence of English viol players (such as William Young and Henry Butler), the German violin school (J.J. Walther and H.I.F. von Biber) and indigenous polyphonic string music (David Petersen and Carolus Hacquart). Schenck's best-known work, the Scherzi musicali published a decade later, shows French influence in its emphasis on dance movements and its more elegant, though still demanding, writing for the viol.

Schenck's viol music culminated in Le nymphe di Rheno and L'echo du Danube. The former consists of duets for two equal viols, in which the relatively modest technical demands may reflect the level of the dedicatee, Schenck's employer Johann Wilhelm. In the six ambitious sonatas of L'echo du Danube the influence of modern Italian string sonatas is prominent. The solo bass viol reigns supreme, while the basso continuo diminishes in importance and is omitted altogether from the last two sonatas. Unfortunately, the principal part of Schenck's last published work, which contained 12 sonatas for viol and continuo, is lost. Two publications include the violin. One of these, Il giardino armonico, is lost; the other, Suonate a violino e violone o cimbalo, although published in 1699, is much earlier and contains a miscellany of pieces (suites, sonatas, fantasias and variations) for violin and continuo, showing the composer at the crossroads of various national influences and avoiding the extreme virtuosity of the viol music.

Schenck published three books of songs to Dutch texts. His compositional début of 1687 contains the vocal pieces written for the opera Bacchus, Ceres en Venus, with words by Govert Bidloo; the rather ambitious Koninklyke harpliederen (of which the parts for two viols and continuo are lost) and the more modest continuo songs published as Zang-wyze both contain settings of religious poems. With these songs Schenck made an important contribution to the brief flowering of Dutch art song, as well as of Dutch opera, at the end of the 17th century.

PIETER DIRKSEN

Schenk, Erich (b Salzburg, 5 May 1902; d Vienna, 11 Oct 1974). Austrian musicologist. He studied theory and the piano at the Salzburg Mozarteum (and later at the Munich Akademie der Tonkunst), and from 1920 musicology with Sandberger at the University of Munich, where he took the doctorate in 1925 with a dissertation on Paganelli. He then went on a study trip to Italy, returning to further training in musicology with Adler and Lach in Vienna, and with Wolf and Schering in Berlin. After a short period as a teacher and librarian at the Salzburg Mozarteum (1925–6) and as press officer to the Salzburg Festival (1927), he completed the Habilitation in 1929 at Rostock University with a work on the trio sonata in Germany after Corelli. In 1936 he founded, and until 1940 directed, the musicology department at Rostock. In 1940 he was appointed successor to Lach at Vienna University and during the war he worked on projects in Italy with the SS-Ahnenerbe and consulted with the music division under the Nazi ideologue Alfred Rosenberg on various publishing and educational projects. He became a member of the Austrian Academy of Sciences in 1944 and in 1946 chairman of the academy's commission for music research and director of its publications, the Mitteilungen der Kommission für Musikforschung (founded 1955), the Veröffentlichungen (founded 1947) and the Tabulae Musicae Austriacae (founded 1964). In 1950–51 he became dean of the philosophy faculty in Vienna and in 1957–8 he was the first musicologist to become rector of the university. As director of the musicology institute for more than 30 years (until 1971) he greatly improved study conditions.

Schenk's main field of work was musical history from the 17th century to the 19th, chiefly the Baroque and Classical eras. His reputation rests particularly on his work for Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich, which he revived very soon after World War II (1947) with a volume of Fux's keyboard works. He was responsible for the publication of this series until 1972. He revived Studien zur Musikwissenschaft in 1955 when he also founded the series of books Wiener Beiträge zur Musikwissenschaft. He worked extensively on Mozart, but also prepared many performing editions of lesser known Italian and German Baroque composers.

RUDOLF KLEIN/PAMELA M. POTTER

Schenk, Johann Baptist (b Wiener Neustadt, 30 Nov 1753; d Vienna, 29 Dec 1836). Austrian composer and music teacher. According to his autobiographical sketch he was born on 30 November 1761, an erroneous date taken over by Eitner and others. The son of an employee at the Wiener Neustadt military academy, he was instructed in the rudiments of music before studying with Anton Stoll, choirmaster at Baden and later a friend of Mozart's. He wrote songs, dances and symphonies while still a boy, and became a proficient violinist and keyboard and wind player. In 1773 he went to Vienna, where he became Wagenseil's pupil for counterpoint and composition (the works of Handel, to which Wagenseil introduced him, made a deep impression on him). By the time of Wagenseil's death in 1777 he had advanced sufficiently to be able to undertake various large-scale compositions: Leopold Hofmann performed a mass by him at the Stephansdom in 1778, in 1779 his Stabat mater was performed four times around Easter, and in 1780 he began to compose for the theatre. Although his incidental music to Blumauer's tragedy Erwine von Steinheim (1780) was successful, he did not press for performance of five early Singspiele; even the pronounced success of the two works he wrote anonymously for Marinelli's Theater in der Leopoldstadt (Die Weinlese, 1785; Die Weihnacht auf dem Lande, 1786) did not diminish his diffidence. These two Singspiele, with their important roles for the comic character Kasperl (played by La Roche) were followed by works written for the Kärntnertortheater and Schikaneder's Theater auf der Wieden. In the late 1780s Schenk also met with success as an instrumental composer: six of his symphonies were performed at F.B. von Keess's concerts, and Schenk remarked in his autobiography on Haydn's complimentary and encouraging comments about them.

It was the mid-1790s before Schenk established himself at the court theatres. His Singspiel Achmet und Almanzine had five performances in 1795, and brought him in an honorarium of 225 gulden. Some commentaries confuse it with Achmet und Zenide, a play by Iffland that was performed four times in 1796–7. A more widespread and serious confusion surrounds an operetta Der Bettelstudent, oder Das Donnerwetter, held to have been performed at the Kärntnertortheater on 9 February 1796 with music by Schenk and text by Paul Weidmann. Weidmann's comedy of this name had been performed frequently since its Burgtheater première on 6 October 1776, and it was also produced in three other Viennese theatres. As a Singspiel with music by Winter it had been given at Munich on 2 February 1785, and in Vienna's Theater in der Leopoldstadt on 19 July 1785. But the court theatre playbills for 1796 invariably refer to Der Bettelstudent merely as a comedy ('Lustspiel'), and it was not performed on 4 March 1796, the date usually given as the première of Schenk's 'Singspiel'. There is no record of Schenk's receiving payment for a Bettelstudent, and no trace of a score, and it must be considered highly doubtful if Schenk did write this work.

With Der Dorfbarbier (autumn 1796), Schenk's masterpiece, the ground is firmer. In 1799 a new Schenk Singspiel, Die Jagd, was given with limited success. His last, Der Fassbinder (1802), is sometimes attributed to Ignaz Umlauf (who had died six and a half years earlier), or held to be a ballet, or assumed to be identical with the original Audinot-Gossec Le tonnelier, which, as Der Fassbinder, had often been heard in Vienna since 1776. Although the 1802 version remains close to the original French story, and the (anonymous) libretto differs little from the earlier text, there is no doubt that the score for the 1802 production is a new and original work by Schenk. Schenk's Der Fassbinder had 43 performances in the court theatres until 1810, and was also staged at Eisenstadt in 1805 and in the Theater in der Leopoldstadt in 1812. It is a charming piece, not markedly below Der Dorfbarbier in musical (or dramatic) quality. Schenk stated in his autobiographical sketch that he also began to write a grand opera in the manner of Gluck at the turn of the century, but was obliged to abandon it owing to lack of progress and ill-health. For the rest of his long life he lived in the shadow of Der Dorfbarbier, an undisputed if minor masterpiece. Indeed, after 1802 he wrote no further works for the stage, though at the time of his death he was revising Die Jagd with the help of his friend, the dramatist and poet Eduard von Bauernfeld. Schenk's later years were spent mainly in teaching and in writing a small quantity of vocal and choral works, including two cantatas, given at the Redoutensaal in 1819 (these were Die Huldigung, 28 February, and Der Mai, 7 May). He himself referred in his interesting but factually unreliable autobiographical sketch to his preference for 'a peaceful and withdrawn private life'; although in the mid-1790s he was Kapellmeister to Prince Auersperg, he did not relish regular employment and responsibilities such as a Kapellmeister's position would have demanded.

Schenk is frequently mentioned in Beethoven literature as the man who, at Abbé Josef Gelinek's introduction, aided Beethoven in 1793 with his counterpoint and composition exercises, which Haydn was presumably too preoccupied to correct. Among Schenk's other pupils were Bauernfeld (who mentioned in his memoirs that Schenk introduced him to Schubert with happy results) and Joseph Weigl's daughter. To Weigl himself Schenk bequeathed his music (the collection later passed to the keeping of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna). His friendly relationship with Mozart is attested in Schenk's well-known statement that Mozart responded to his admiration for the overture of Die Zauberflöte at its première by stroking his cheek and smiling, while continuing to conduct with the other hand.

Der Dorfbarbier was for some 25 years one of the most popular and successful of operas. At the Vienna court theatres alone it was given 318 times until 1819; it was mounted at the Theater in der Leopoldstadt in 1821 and achieved nearly 50 performances there up to 1858. It was given in most German-language opera houses for much of the 19th century. It was also staged in Poland, Hungary, Russia, Bohemia, the Netherlands, Sweden and the USA, and is still occasionally revived in Euopean houses. It is based on a play of the same name that had been in the repertory of the Burgtheater since 1785 but had not achieved much success. Opinion differs as to whether the original play, and its refashioning as libretto, was the work of the dramatist Paul Weidmann or of his elder brother Joseph, a singer; the latter is now regarded as the favourite candidate, though both were probably involved. As a Singspiel Der Dorfbarbier was slow to make its mark. Even the date of the première is a matter for dispute. The playbills for the Kärntnertortheater and Burgtheater respectively give 30 October ('zum erstenmal') and 7 November ('zum zweytenmal') 1796 as the dates of the first two performances; Schenk named 6 November 1798. The box-office records, perhaps the most reliable source, indicate 6 November 1796. As the work was given anonymously at first, and there is no record of when – if at all – Schenk received his honorarium, it may be assumed that at the time of the première anything but a popular success was expected. Following one or two performances in the autumn of 1796 Der Dorfbarbier disappeared from the repertory for ten months, and it was 1798 before it began to be given regularly. Its success was certainly due in part to a succession of famous singing actors (Joseph Weidmann, Hasenhut and later Johann Nestroy) and opera singers (Weinmüller, Friedrich Baumann, Magdalena Willmann, Johann Michael Vogl, Maria Anna Gassmann) in its leading roles; yet Schenk's music is an excellent example of the Viennese Singspiel at its best, with charming melodies, well developed and neatly orchestrated; abundant variety between solo numbers of various kinds and duets or larger ensembles; and a well-constructed, witty yet affecting libretto. Many anecdotes testify to its hold on audiences and performers, and in the 1840s it could not have seemed particularly surprising to find Beethoven's librettist G.F. Treitschke writing an article entitled 'Die Zauberflöte, Der Dorfbarbier, Fidelio' (Orpheus, ii, 1841, p.239). Weber, who conducted Der Dorfbarbier at Prague in 1816, seems to have recalled Suschen's Polacca, 'Mädchen kann man leicht betören', when writing Aennchen's music in Der Freischütz a few years later; and Lortzing, too, knew and appreciated it. The researches of Midori Takeishi have cleared up many of the uncertainties surrounding Schenk's stage works.

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Schenk, Johannes. See SCHENCK, JOHANNES.

Schenk, Otto (b Vienna, 12 June 1930). Austrian actor and director. He studied acting at the Max Reinhardt Seminar and theatre at Vienna University and began his theatrical career as an actor. In 1957 he began a successful career as an opera director with Die Zauberflöte at the Salzburg Landestheater. He directed the same work at the Salzburg Festival in 1963, by which time he had already directed successful productions of von Einem's Dantons Tod and Berg's Lulu at the Vienna Festival. In 1965 he was appointed resident director at the Vienna Staatsoper, where most of his acclaimed productions have been staged: Der Rosenkavalier (with Leonard Bernstein) in 1969, Der Freischütz (with Karl Böhm) in 1972 and L'elisir d'amore (at the Theater an der Wien) in 1973. During the 1970s he became one of the most sought-after opera directors on the international circuit, making his début at the Metropolitan Opera with Tosca (1968; Fidelio followed in 1970), at La Scala with Le nozze di Figaro (1974) and at Covent Garden with Un ballo in maschera (1975).

These productions – often in collaboration with the designer Jürgen Rose – were notable for their attention to stylish period detail. In the 1980s and 90s he remained an arch-traditionalist, turning his back on the fashionable modernism of his German contemporaries. His romantic production of Der Ring des Nibelungen at the Metropolitan Opera (1986–9) can be seen as a reaction against the political interpretations of Götz Friedrich, Patrice Chéreau and Harry Kupfer. Schenk is at his most assured in comedy, and his productions of Viennese operetta, above all of Die Fledermaus, which he has directed all over the world, have a charm and taste which few can rival. His interpretation of the spoken role of the gaoler Frosch in Die Fledermaus is justly famous.

HUGH CANNING

Schenker, Friedrich (b Zeulenroda, Thuringia, 23 Dec 1942). German composer and trombonist. At the Eisler Hochschule für Musik in Berlin (1961–4) he studied the trombone and composition with Kochan. In 1969 he passed the state composition examination at the Leipzig Hochschule für Musik, where his examiner was Fritz Geissler. His studies were completed in Dessau's masterclass at the German Academy of Arts in East Berlin (1973). He was a member of the Leipzig Radio Symphony Orchestra (1964–82), and since 1982 he has been working as a freelance composer and musician. With the oboist Burkhard Glaetzner, to whom he dedicated some of his pieces for oboe, he co-founded in 1970 the Gruppe Neue Musik Hanns Eisler, East Germany's most committed avant-garde music ensemble. In 1982 he became an adviser for contemporary music at the Leipzig Gewandhaus under Masur, and in 1983 he was appointed lecturer in composition at the Leipzig Hochschule für Musik. He became a member of the East German Academy of Arts in 1986.

Schenker's music shows a marked interest in experiment and musical expressivity. In the early 1970s he ranked among East Germany's most radical avant-garde artists, many of his performances in the concert hall provoking scandals. Schenker uses serial and aleatory techniques, musical allusions, subtle distortions and theatrical effects. As a trombonist, Schenker is also an engaged interpreter of new music.

ECKART SCHWINGER/LARS KLINGBERG

Schenker, Heinrich (b Wisniowczyki, Galicia, 19 June 1868; d Vienna, 13 Jan 1935). Austrian theorist. While at the Gymnasium in Lemberg (now L'viv), he studied piano with Karol Mikuli, a pupil of Chopin. Following the wishes of his father, a Jewish physician, he went to Vienna to study law at the university (1884–8). While completing his law degree he enrolled in the conservatory (1887–9), where he studied the piano with Ernst Ludwig and harmony with Bruckner. After withdrawing from the conservatory to support his widowed mother and sister and brother, he met with modest success in Vienna as an accompanist, composer, critic and editor. He regularly accompanied the Dutch baritone Johannes Messchaert. After the turn of the century, however, he focussed on writing, editing and private piano teaching. This work attracted the attention of musicians and students: Wilhelm Furtwängler, impressed by Schenker's treatise on Beethoven's Ninth Symphony (1912), became a lifelong friend; Anthony van Hoboken gave financial support to his work in later years; and several of his pupils became eminent scholars and teachers, including Felix Eberhard von Cube, Oswald Jonas, Felix Salzer, Otto Vrieslander and Hans Weisse.

Pervading his work is a deep, abiding interest in preserving and understanding the intentions of composers. He deplored the intrusive and obfuscating alterations that editors such as Hans von Bülow had made to works of the past masters, because he thought they obscured the composers' intentions. He prepared editions of works by Handel, C.P.E. Bach and Beethoven based on first editions and, where available, autographs. Among the most significant are the 'Erläuterungsausgaben' of Beethoven's last five piano sonatas (the edition of op.106 was not completed due to lack of an extant autograph). This editorial work led him to instigate the establishment of the Vienna Archiv für Photogramme musikalischer Meister-Handschriften in 1927 under the direction of O.E. Deutsch, with funds provided by van Hoboken (it is now in A-Wn).

Schenker's theory amounts to a probing analysis of musical cognition within the tradition of Western European music as practised in the 18th and 19th centuries. In his theoretical writings he established the cognitive prototypes of musical perception, based upon subtle readings of works by composers widely recognized as the leading artists in the tradition, vigorous examination of his own hearing and a thorough study of the evidence presented indirectly in the disciplines of species counterpoint (according to Fux) and thorough-bass (according to C.P.E. Bach). In his analytical writings he illustrated how his theory of musical cognition operated in the perception of musical artworks. The cognition Schenker described is the superior competence of a skilled practitioner, not the ordinary competence of average musicians or listeners. He was convinced, in fact, that his theory accurately described the mind and intentions of master composers. To the extent that it is a theory of how mental prototypes shape musical perception, his theory is consistent in its approach with the most recent advances in the understanding of perception.

The core of his theory is contained in the three volumes of Neue musikalischen Theorien und Phantasien, i: Harmonielehre (1906); ii: Kontrapunkt (bk 1, 1910; bk 2, 1922); and iii: Der freie Satz (1935). Conceptually speaking, the beginning of the set is Kontrapunkt, in which Schenker explicated the rules of the Fuxian species method and critiqued the formulations and explanations of Fux, Albrechtsberger, Cherubini and Bellermann. Taking the concept of triadic consonance as axiomatic, he defined the character of intervallic relations between and within melodic lines and established the transient rhythmic nature of dissonance, with its ineluctable need for future resolution into consonance. He elucidated the rhythmic and melodic aspects of the concept of passing (Durchgang) and pointed out ways in which the concept of passing could be extended (or 'prolonged') to cover more complex tonal configurations. Later writings reveal that he regarded the even pace of strict counterpoint as a norm for interpreting the rhythm of free melodies. In Book 1 he frequently provided insights into the connection between strict counterpoint and free composition (freier Satz), where interpreting the behaviour of voices is influenced by other factors such as harmonic progression, motivic repetition and the desire for special compositional effects. In Book 2 he extended the principles of two-voice settings to counterpoint of three or more voices and concluded by proposing that harmonic scale degrees play the role of the cantus firmus tones in free compositions.

In Harmonielehre Schenker elaborated the concept of the harmonic scale degree (Stufe), which he defined as a triad whose root is located on a scale of perfect 5ths emanating from a tonic triad. The triads in this series form a diatonic system. He argued that the individual harmonic degree could be manifested melodically, as a single chord, or as a contrapuntal complex of many lines and many chords, and he formulated a set of principles for identifying harmonic degrees in compositions. He also described the psychology of ascribing tonic function to a triad, the forms of harmonic progression (Stufengang) and the procedure for giving a harmonic degree the temporary function of a tonic (Tonikalisierung, 'tonicization'). With the concept of tonicization he reinterpreted previous notions of 'key' and 'modulation'. This permitted him to assert plausibly that the tonal composition expresses a single tonality, within which one or more non-tonic degrees may be tonicized for a period of time. A triad, for example, that is the second tonic in a sonata exposition may also be regarded as a component of a broader harmonic progression unfolding in the main key.

In Der freie Satz, published shortly after his death, Schenker expounded ideas initially developed in essays in Der Tonwille (1921–4) and Das Meisterwerk in der Musik (1925–30). The idea with the most wide-ranging application is the Zug ('linear progression'), which can be defined as a direct passing between two non-adjacent notes. With this idea Schenker was able to describe melodic movement with great precision: departures, arrivals, detours, reversals and so forth. The Zug is a norm for interpreting the ebb and flow of free melodies, just as even pace is a norm for intepreting the rhythm of free melodies. In the 1920s he began to interpret large-scale melodic trajectories in terms of a simple line that he called the Urlinie, an idea introduced in his commentated edition of Beethoven's op. 101 (1921). Initially, the Urlinie was a chain of linear progressions that spanned a section or movement, counterpointed by a progression of Stufen; these simple lines frequently contained motivic repetitions. In later writings and in Der freie Satz the Urlinie became a single Zug that descends from the third, fifth or octave to the root of the tonic triad, and the lower harmonic counterpoint of abstract Stufen became the structure of a bass line that arpeggiates the tonic triad (root-fifth-root). Schenker coined the term Ursatz for the contrapuntal combination of an Urlinie-Zug and Bassbrechung ('bass arpeggiation').

Der freie Satz is structured as a detailed explication of the proposition that the tonal composition unfolds in a single triad, a proposal put forth three decades earlier in Harmonielehre. Schenker explained concepts that enable a composer or listener to sustain a single triad through time, which is to say that his theory describes forms of musical memory: how to keep a single triad in mind over a period of time and how to interpret configurations of notes as contributing to the continuity of that memory. Der freie Satz is thus more of a treatise in music psychology than a textbook of analysis. Its principal topic is the conceptual structure of the triadically tonal musical mind. Schenker proceeded from a 'fundamental structure' (the Ursatz) through a series of progressive elaborations to a description of a richly complex sequence of events. The middleground of the theory is a repertory of linear configurations that arise repeatedly in the analysis of tonal works: interruption, arpeggiation, reaching-over, various types of linear progression, unfolding, register transfer and coupling. Ever mindful of the particularities of individual compositions, Schenker also discussed the stunningly diverse combinations of relationships that are actualized in masterworks. Hence, in the last and longest section of Der freie Satz, the so-called foreground of the theory, he discussed how concepts such as harmony, counterpoint, metre, motivic repetition and form interact with the conceptual structure of voice-leading. But despite containing many fascinating, even brilliant insights into individual compositions, Der freie Satz remains only one component of Schenker's theory.

Proof of the theoretical claims made in Neue musikalischen Theorien und Phantasien lies in the interpretations which those claims made possible. Accordingly, Schenker decided at the outset of his writing career that he would supplement Theorien und Phantasien with texts devoted to individual masterpieces, in order to illustrate how his theory of the master musician's mind worked in practice. This 'literature supplement' includes the commentated edition of J.S. Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue (1910), the treatise on Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Beethoven 'Erläuterungsausgaben', and interpretative essays in Der Tonwille and Das Meisterwerk in der Musik, the latter including extremely detailed treatments of Mozart's G minor Symphony K550 and Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony. The interpretative texts have a fixed format: representation of the work's content, discussion of sketches or manuscripts (if extant), an edition of the score or commentary on published editions, discussion of issues related to performance and critique of the relevant secondary literature.

Representation of a work's content consists of detailed description of the 'responses' (Wirkungen, 'effects') which the composer intended the tonal configurations to elicit in the properly attuned listener or performer. Schenker was concerned above all with 'synthesis', by which he meant the interaction, sometimes cooperative, sometimes antagonistic, of the independent modes of musical cognition: the several dispositions to hear tones in terms of harmony, counterpoint, linear progression, motivic repetition, form and possibly programme or text. He generally narrated the course of musical events from beginning to end, starting with the long-range trajectory of the Ursatz and proceeding to finer details. The texts in Der Tonwille and Das Meisterwerk in der Musik are accompanied by illustrations that use a combination of musical notation and special symbols to represent the trajectories of voice-leading and harmony. Schenker described long-range, mid-range and short-range melodic trajectories in a set of 'layers' (Schichten), divided under the headings background, middleground and foreground. The most detailed of these is the Urlinie-Tafel, a 'chart' that lays out all the linear and harmonic trajectories, establishes their connection with the Urlinie and shows the formal articulations and principal thematic units.

With the exception of the Fünf Urlinie-Tafeln (1932), Schenker made extensive use of prose to describe the nuances of musical effects. While a musical illustration, for example, could clearly show the path of a linear progression (Zug), only prose permitted description of what it is like to follow that path: how the linear progression moves in a particular direction and in a particular location within the texture of the piece, how it is paced, whether it is hesitant or storming, tumbling or dragging, how directly or indirectly the goal is reached, and whether setbacks, delays or detours are encountered. Several texts even include highly nuanced programmatic descriptions based on observation of the musical effects, but he strongly criticized the rhetorical excesses of hermeneutic writers such as Hermann Kretzschmar, Wilhelm von Lenz, Paul Bekker and A.B. Marx, because they failed to demonstrate a connection between the composer's configuration of tones and their highly figurative descriptions. Schenker intended his publications to aid performers more than scholars. Annotated editions and commentaries on performing practice were meant to be of direct practical utility, while the theoretical and interpretative writings were meant to help performers refine and train their musical intuitions.

Several projects were left unfinished at his death, including treatises on form and performing practice as well as numerous interpretations of musical works. Much of his Nachlass is contained in the Ernst Oster Collection (US-NYp); a smaller amount is held in the Oswald Jones Memorial Collection, Heinrich Schenker Archive, at the University of California, Riverside; and some portions belong to the estate of Felix Salzer.

ROBERT SNARRENBERG

Schentzer, Johannes [Hans] (*b c*1485; d after 1540). German organ builder. His name appears on the taxation roll of Stuttgart for 1508. In 1511 he entered into a contract to build an organ at St Gallen Abbey (two manuals and pedal, 26 stops). In 1514–15 he enlarged the organ at St Thomas, Strasbourg. In 1515 he repaired the small organ in Konstanz Cathedral, and in 1516–20 he built the large organ there (two manuals and pedal, *c*31 stops). He built organs for St Thomas, Strasbourg (1522–3), Meersburg, near Konstanz (1517), and Bischofszell (1519–23). In 1525 he became a citizen of Meersburg. In 1529 he repaired the organ in Speyer Cathedral and in 1540–41 that of Strasbourg Cathedral. Schentzer probably collaborated on Fridolin Sicher's composition, Resonet in laudibus, which appeared in the St Gallen Organ Book, compiled between 1512 and 1521.

The period about 1500 was a highpoint for organ building in the south-west part of the German-speaking regions. Schentzer was associated with this development, together with such masters of the craft as H. Tugi, W. and R. Eckstetter, M. Affelturer, J. Sager and K. Reutter. It was in this region, during this period, that several types of organ stop originated: the narrow-scaled Schwegel (later known as Viola da gamba) and Schellenpfeife (later Quintaden); 'Horn mixtures' containing tierces (still of Principal scale and counting as mixtures proper); and reeds with full-length resonators (Posaune, Trompete, Krummhorn and Zink). The designs of this group of organ builders were the most richly varied of the time, corresponding to a golden age for organ music in south-west Germany. Organs had two manuals, with ranges F to a″ (pedals F to c′) with complete Principal choruses of at least three stops and often up to five or more. Other stops included the Regal and the wide-scaled Gedackt, Hohlflöte and Gemshorn, as well as the narrow-scaled stops and full-length reeds already mentioned. Schentzer's organs represented this type in its most highly developed form.

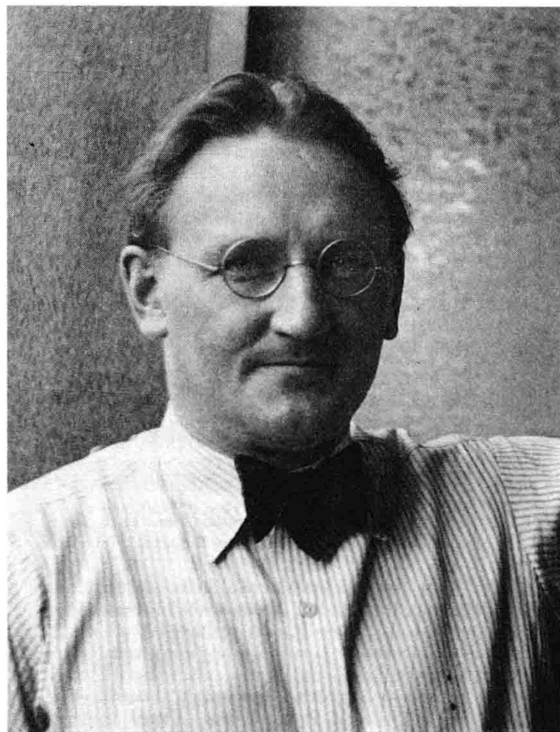
Scherbaum, Adolf (b Eger, 23 Aug 1909; d Heilsbronn, nr Nuremberg, 2 Aug 2000). German trumpeter of Bohemian birth. He studied at the Prague Conservatory from 1923 to 1929, and then obtained his first professional position in a spa orchestra in Moravia. In 1929 he was appointed first trumpet in the orchestra of the Brno Opera, and subsequently became principal trumpet in orchestras in Prague (1939–41), Berlin (1941–5), Bratislava (1946–51) and Hamburg (1951–66). From 1966 to 1974 he was professor at the Musikhochschule in Saarbrücken.



Scherbaum was already well known as a soloist before World War II. By rigorous training he developed unusually strong diaphragm and cheek muscles for sustained playing in the high register. Thus equipped, he played a leading part in the European revival of the trumpet as a solo instrument in Baroque music, and he was the first to use a piccolo B♭ trumpet for D trumpet parts. He toured throughout the world, as a soloist and with his own Baroque ensemble, and made many recordings, including several of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto no.2 (which he performed more than 400 times). For a few years, from 1971, he advised the firm of Scherbaum & Göttner (his son, also called Adolf, was one of the owners), which made trumpets with detachable bells, and mouthpieces in three parts, to allow great flexibility of timbre and pitch. Scherbaum's instruments are now in the Bad Säckingen Trumpet Museum.

EDWARD H. TARR

Scherchen, Hermann (b Berlin, 21 June 1891; d Florence, 12 June 1966). German conductor. He was mainly self-taught as a musician, and from the age of 16 was a violist in the Blüthner Orchestra and the Berlin PO, 1907–10. In 1911 he worked with Schoenberg in preparing Pierrot lunaire for performance, and made his début as a conductor during the German tour that followed the work's Berlin première, showing the support for new musical trends that characterized most of his later work. He became conductor of the Riga SO in 1914, but was interned by the Russians when war broke out. On his return to Berlin in 1918 he founded the Neue Musikgesellschaft, the Scherchen Quartet and, in 1919, the militant musical journal Melos. At this time he also lectured at the Musikhochschule, directed a working-men's choir, and in 1921 became conductor of the Leipzig Konzertverein's Grotrian-Steinweg Orchestra. He succeeded Furtwängler as director of the Frankfurt Museumskonzerte in 1922, and in the same year began an association with the Winterthur Musikkollegium in Switzerland that continued intermittently until 1947. He was also actively involved with the ISCM from its foundation in 1923, and was frequently the principal conductor at its festivals, both before and after World War II. During the 1920s and 30s he toured widely in Europe, making regular appearances in London, and among the many new works whose premières he gave were the Three Fragments from Wozzeck at Frankfurt in 1924 (the year before the opera was first staged under Kleiber), and Hába's Matka at Munich (1930). He was appointed Generalmusikdirektor at Königsberg in 1928 and chief conductor of the East German RO, but in 1933 he left Germany to settle in Switzerland, where he became musical director of the Zürich RO and later at Beromünster. In 1936 he conducted the première of Berg's Violin Concerto, in Barcelona. He edited Musica viva, a journal for new music published in Brussels (1933–6), and gave regular courses in conducting which became an annual summer school in Switzerland in 1939. That year he formed the Ars Viva Orchestra, with which he often toured, and in 1943 at Winterthur he conducted the première of Webern's Variations for Orchestra op.30, with the composer present.

After the war Scherchen resumed his varied activities on a wider scale. He held masterclasses in conducting at the Venice Biennale and at Darmstadt; founded the Ars Viva edition (for the publication of new music) at Zürich in 1950; and, with the support of UNESCO, opened a studio for electro-acoustic research in 1954 at Gravesano, the Swiss village where he lived; its scientific results were published in the Gravesaner Blätter. At the same time he brought fresh vigour to the propagation of new music, conducting the stage premières of such works as Dallapiccola's Il prigioniero (1950, Florence), Dessau's Das Verhör des Lukullus (1951, Berlin) and the original version of Henze's König Hirsch (1956, Berlin). His Darmstadt performance in 1951 of 'Der Tanz um das goldene Kalb' from Moses und Aron was the first music to be heard from Schoenberg's opera. He edited the score for the opera's Hamburg radio première under Rosbaud in 1954, and he conducted the 1959 production at the Berlin Städtische Oper that was regarded as decisive for the work's wider success. His début in the USA was not until 1964, when he appeared first at Philadelphia and later in New York.

Scherchen was one of the 20th century's outstanding musical pioneers, and his career was principally dedicated to the better understanding of contemporary music. He refused to limit his interest to accepted styles and was open to all forms of musical experiment, thereby influencing a generation of younger practitioners by his example and his teaching. His conducting, which usually disdained the use of a baton, was functional, clear and scholarly, but it combined knowledge of detail with vitality of spirit. He wrote a practical and informative textbook on his approach and method. Many of his performances were regarded as model interpretations, especially of works of the Second Viennese School, and of Busoni, Dallapiccola, Hindemith, Prokofiev and Stravinsky. They formed a point of reference for those who followed him. He composed a string quartet, piano trio and songs (Heine-Lieder), and made a successful orchestral transcription of Bach's Art of Fugue. His work continued until four days before his death, when he had a heart attack during a performance of Malipiero's Orfeide at Florence.

GERHARD BRUNNER/R

Scherchen(-Hsiao), Tona (b Neuchâtel, 12 March 1938). French composer of Eurasian origin. She received training in traditional Chinese music, especially the pipa, from her mother, the composer Xiao Shuxian (Hsiao Shu-sien) in China, where she also studied literature and the other arts. Her father, the conductor Hermann Scherchen, introduced her to Western music. Later she studied with Henze at the Salzburg Mozarteum (1961–3), Schaeffer at the Groupe de Recherches Musicales, Messiaen at the Paris Conservatoire (1963–5), and Ligeti in Vienna. She won the Prix de Rome in 1964, and later adopted French citizenship.

Since the 1980s, Scherchen has concentrated on music as an interactive art, synchronizing sound with lighting and live theatre. Scherchen emphasizes both the temporal and the sonorous aspects of music. Compositional innovation goes hand in hand with a concern for sound itself: in that way, her music reflects both her Asian and her Western heritage. Her music has gained wide acceptance, on the basis of both its technical innovation and its references to new worlds of sonority. She received the Italia Prize in 1991, a prize from the Koussevitzky Foundation, the Grand Prix Hervé Dujardin of the SACEM, and the first prize of the Gaudeamus Foundation.

JAMES R. BRISCOE

Scherer (i). German family of organ builders. Jakob Scherer (d Hamburg, 1574 or later), took over the business of Jakob Iversand (d Hamburg, 1537), who had built organs for the Jacobikirche and the Petrikirche, Hamburg (1512–16 and earlier). Scherer was active from 1538 to 1570; he built new organs for Ratzeburg Cathedral (1551–63; one manual, 11 stops), the Marienkirche, Stettin (1557–60), the Jakobikirche, Stettin (1564–6), and the Jakobikirche, Magdeburg (1568), and he carried out major alterations at the Nikolaikirche, Mölln (1555–8), and the Nikolaikirche, Kiel (1564; two manuals, 22 stops). He built a new Rückpositiv for the Totentanzorgel at the Marienkirche, Lübeck, 1557–8, and a new Brustwerk for the large organ there, 1560–61. He was repeatedly engaged at St Katharina and the Jacobikirche, Hamburg, where he was assisted for some of the time by his son-in-law Dirk Hoyer. Hans Scherer the elder (d Hamburg, 1611) is known to have been assisting his father as early as 1541. His organs include those at the Marienkirche, Bernau (1572–3), the Marienkirche, Stendal (1580; with a new Rückpositiv; some stops and the casework survive), the Nikolaikirche, Lüneburg (1594), the Protestant church at Meldorf (1596–7), Brake Castle (1600; two manuals, 20 stops), St Georg, Hildesheim (1601–5), the Gertrudenkirche, Hamburg (1605–7), and Rotenburg Castle, Hanover (1608). He also carried out important alterations and enlargements at St Katharina, the Petrikirche and the Jacobikirche (enlarged to three manuals, 54 stops), Hamburg, and elsewhere.

Organs built by Hans the younger (*fl c*1600–31), who worked until 1612 with his brother Fritz, include three at Kassel: the Schlosskirche (1607–9; two manuals, 20 stops), the Brüderkirche (*c*1610; two manuals, 25 stops), and the Martinskirche (1600–12; three manuals, 33 stops), and other instruments at the Marienkirche, Lemgo (1612; the front pipes survive), the Stephanskirche, Tangermünde (three manuals, 32 stops; the casework and half of the pipework survive; restored and reconstructed 1994), the Aegidienkirche, Lübeck (1624–5; the casework survives), and Minden Cathedral (1625–6). He rebuilt the organ at St Georgen, Hamburg (1627–8; two stops and some pipes survive in Lenzen).

Pupils of Hans the elder include Hans Bockelmann (organs at Hemme, 1598, and Marne, 1609–10) and Anton Wilde (organs at Lüdingworth, 1598–9, and Wöhrden, 1593–5; both survive in an altered form). His most important pupil was his son, Hans the younger, who was responsible for the most mature examples of the famous 'Hamburg organ front' (introduced by the Scherer family at the Jacobikirche, Hamburg, in 1576); the organ at Tangermünde is an example of his work.

The Scherer family, particularly Hans the elder and Hans the younger, played a significant part in the development of the Hamburg organ style of the late Renaissance and early Baroque, which was to reach its final stage with Gottfried Fritzsche. They combined into a coherent whole three distinct organ types: the splendid, though relatively undeveloped, organ of early Hamburg (as built by Iversand); the Brabant organ (see NIEHOFF); and the organ of central Germany (see BECK). The Hauptwerk of their organs was divided into two parts: Oberwerk and Oberpositiv, and in contrast to the Brabant organ they retained the use of slider-chests and made the Pedal fully independent.

HANS KLOTZ/DIETRICH KOLLMANNSPERGER

Scherer (ii). German family of woodwind instrument makers, active in Butzbach. They were previously thought to have worked in France. Their instruments, representing a rich variety of 18th-century types, were widely admired and widely sold in their own time; an advertisement which appeared in the Lyons Les affiches on 15 February 1764 offered for sale 'a very good bassoon of Scherer' and Frederick the Great of Prussia apparently performed on a Scherer ivory flute (the instrument was stolen at the end of World War II from the Musikinstrumenten-Museum in Berlin).

The Scherer workshop was established by Johannes (ii) (b Butzbach, 24 Jan 1664; d Butzbach, 28 April 1722), who had been trained by his father, Johannes (i) (b Mörlen, *c*1627; d Butzbach, 1707), a turner. Johannes (ii) was listed in the town records only as a drechsler (turner) during his father's lifetime, but beginning in 1711 he was identified as a 'Drechsler und Pfeiffenmacher'. A house at 13 Wetzlarerstrasse (now restored), purchased by Johannes (ii) by 1708, the year he first paid taxes on the property, served as both residence and workshop. A son, Georg Henrich Scherer (b Butzbach, 17 Nov 1703; d Butzbach, 11 May 1778), took over the business at the age of 19 upon his father's death and was every bit his equal, perhaps surpassing him in elegance and refinement of design. In one year's tax record Georg Henrich was described as a turner and oboe maker but he was more frequently listed as a Kunstdrechsler – an artist-turner as opposed to a more utilitarian craftsman. At the age of 38 Georg Henrich was appointed a member of the town council and a few years later, in 1749, he was made a royal tax commissioner for Hesse-Darmstadt, a significant honour and responsibility. None of his siblings was ever listed as a turner or instrument maker, although it is possible that one or other of them may have helped out in the workshop. There do not appear to have been any other woodwind makers in Butzbach who might have been trained by or worked for the Scherers. The workshop apparently ceased operation upon Georg Henrich's death.

Around 60 woodwind instruments by the Scherers survive, but these bear a bewildering number of different stamps and are never dated, making precise attribution difficult. 16 stamps are illustrated by Young and the three most common marks are described by Waterhouse. The surviving instruments include four bassoons and four octave bassoons (three of these eight having duplicate G♯ keys, analogous to the duplicate e♭′ keys of the contemporary oboe), a tenor bassoon, one alto and one bass recorder, 39 flutes, of which all but two are of ivory. Five alto flutes, three ivory oboes, one oboe d'amore and two tenor oboes, and seven clarinets with two or three keys, two of them with ivory bodies. Two walking-stick instruments, made of narwhal tusks, are each comprised of a one-key flute at the upper end and a one-key oboe at the lower end. Of these instruments, Young has attributed at least two bassoons, two or three octave bassoons and a number of clarinets and flutes to Johannes (ii). The Butzbach Stadtmuseum has a Scherer Room with two ivory flutes and other material relating to the woodwind makers.

Scherer [Scherrer, Scheerer], Nicolas (b *c*1747; d 1821). German composer. A harpsichordist and organist in Geneva, he taught Prince Friedrich Franz of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, to whom he dedicated his first publication, Six sonates mises en trio op.1 for harpsichord, violin and cello (as the prince became Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin in 1785, the sonatas must have been printed before then). His other extant works made their way to Schwerin through his connection with the prince and probably date from the same period. They include three sets of three sonatas for harpsichord with obbligato violin (opp.3, 4 and 8), two sets of six sonatas for cello and continuo (opp.5 and 9), Six simphonies for eight instruments (op.6) and a Simphonie périodique (the Six simphonies and Simphonie périodique are edited by X. Bouvier, Geneva, 1991). They were all published in Geneva and are concise, pleasant pieces of chamber music in the style of Haydn. A manuscript march for keyboard by him also survives in manuscript (D-SWl).

DIETER HÄRTWIG

Scherer, Sebastian Anton (b Ulm, 3 Oct 1631; d Ulm, 26 Aug 1712). German composer and organist. He spent almost the whole of his life in his native town. He probably studied with Tobias Eberlin, organist of Ulm Cathedral, whom he succeeded on 22 December 1671 and whose daughter he married. He had been elected a town musician at Ulm on 17 June 1653, and it was probably about this time or shortly afterwards that he became assistant to Eberlin. In 1668 he became director of music at the college in Ulm and taught the cathedral choristers. According to Eitner he was appointed organist of St Thomas's Church, Strasbourg, on 4 November 1684, but, as André Pirro suggested, he only acted as consultant in connection with the organ there: he was in fact organist of Ulm Cathedral for over 40 years up to his death.

Several pieces in Scherer's op.1 reveal a sensitive and imaginative approach to word-setting. He dedicated his op.2 to the collegium musicum at nearby Memmingen, where he may have had family connections and musical associates. The plan of the publication, half of which is in tablature and half in score, owes much to Frescobaldi's Fiori musicali (1635), and the last intonation uses the bergamasca theme that Merulo and Frescobaldi had popularized. The volume is not, then, a livre d'orgue in the French manner but a fine collection of sturdy organ music in the Italian manner, full of ingenuity and invention. Some of the trio sonatas of 1680 are of fine quality, and the slow movements anticipate the restrained beauty of Corelli's sonatas.

Schering, Arnold (b Breslau, 2 April 1877; d Berlin, 7 March 1941). German musicologist. He studied the violin at an early age and in 1896 went to Berlin to study under Joachim with a view to becoming a violin virtuoso. Two years later, however, he decided on an academic career and read history of music at Berlin University with Fleischer and psychology of music with Stumpf. In 1902, after one term at Munich with Sandberger, he took the PhD at Leipzig University under Kretzschmar with a thesis on the early violin concerto; he later published this in an extended form as Die Geschichte des Instrumental-Konzerts bis auf die Gegenwart.

Schering soon became associated with several music journals; he was editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (1903–5) and of the Bach-Jahrbuch (1904–39). In 1907 he completed the Habilitation at Leipzig University with a dissertation on the rise of the oratorio, and in 1915 he became reader there in the history and aesthetics of music. From 1909 he also taught music history at the Leipzig Conservatory. In 1920 Schering succeeded Abert as professor of music at Halle, and in 1928 he moved to Berlin, where he held the chair of musicology until his death. Schering served as director of Denkmäler Deutscher Tonkunst, chair of the Händel-Gesellschaft and president of the Deutsche Musikgesellschaft (in 1933 he oversaw its reorganisation on National Socialist principles and authorized the dismissal of Alfred Einstein, the Jewish editor of its journal).

Schering had a deep love for the music of the past; this music he sought to revive and make relevant to modern times. With this end in view, he inaugurated two serial publications, Perlen Alter Kammermusik and Perlen Alter Gesangsmusik, covering the field of both chamber and vocal music. Other new editions appeared in Denkmäler Deutscher Tonkunst, among them works by Hasse, Kuhnau and Schütz (whose Historie von der Geburt Jesu Christi he had rediscovered at Uppsala in 1908). His greatest contribution to the study of musicology is probably his Geschichte der Musik in Beispielen (1931), remarkable in both the scope and the scholarship of its 300 music examples. He wrote the second and third volumes of a general musical history of Leipzig, the second volume of which includes a detailed discussion of Bach.

One of Schering's main interests was the interpretation of Bach's music. In his attempt to rediscover the key to Bach's art of textual interpretation he brought to light what theorists from the 16th to the 18th centuries had called the ars inveniendi; its musical counterpart he saw in the musica poetica of the Baroque period. His research into the revival of old music found its culmination in his Aufführungspraxis alter Musik (1931); he was also the first to question the generally accepted theory that all sacred music up to the 16th century was performed a cappella.

Influenced by Kretzschmar, Schering tended increasingly to approach musicology from a hermeneutic perspective. He considered music a poetic composition in sound whose source of inspiration was non-musical. He first presented his ideas in the introduction to Beethoven und die Dichtung (1936) and was at that time much criticized; in Das Symbol der Musik (1941), he applied his theory of symbolic interpretation to specific works by Beethoven, arguing that certain string quartets and piano sonatas were inspired by the dramas of Shakespeare and Schiller. Although Schering's theories were based on random observations by the composer, they found favour with some music scholars of Schering's generation.

Scherzo (It.: 'joke'). A term applied to a number of types of piece since the early 17th century. The Italian word scherzo and its derivatives came from the German Scherz and scherzen ('to joke') in the late Middle Ages. Since Beethoven's time it has been applied generically to any movement that takes the place of a minuet in a sonata cycle (whether or not specifically labelled 'scherzo'), and it has also been used to indicate a comic or ironically comic composition, usually fast-moving and often one movement within a larger work.

1. Origins, types. 2. Haydn, Beethoven. 3. Later repertory. 4. Related terminology.

1. ORIGINS, TYPES. The word 'scherzo' was first applied to musical compositions in Italy in 1605 (Gabriello Puliti, Scherzi, capricci et fantasie, per cantar a due voci); soon after, Praetorius introduced it in Germany as a synonym for aria (Syntagma musicum, 1619). 'Scherzo' first referred to a strophic song for one or two voices with basso continuo. Examples appear in collections alongside other vocal types such as madrigal, aria and canzonetta. Publications including scherzos are numerous within the brief period roughly demarcated by Monteverdi's two collections of Scherzi musicali of 1607 and 1632. At this stage scherzo, like madrigal, designated a verse form, and it was only secondarily applied to musical settings of the same or similar types of poetic texts. The originator of the poetic scherzo, and apparently the sole author of scherzos for many years, was Gabriello Chiabrera, whose first scherzos were published in 1599; examples next appeared in anthologies of 1603 and 1605. The first musical publications with the word in the title role are those of Puliti (1605) and Domenico Brunetti (1606), followed by Monteverdi.

The modifier musicali in Monteverdi's title may suggest the unfamiliarity of 'scherzo' as a musical term; few other scherzo publications include it. The term was neither widely nor long known as a poetic title but was soon adopted as one for musical settings of various verse types; indeed Monteverdi selected Chiabrera's canzonette, not his scherzi, as texts for the Scherzi musicali. The comic import of the word was never apparently taken literally. Among the musical scherzos of the early 17th century were the Scherzi musicali ecclesiastici of Bernardino Borlasca (1609), the Arie, scherzi, canonetti, madrigali of Antonio Brunelli (1613), the Scherzi spirituali of Pietro Pace (1615, 1617), the Scherzi sacri of Antonio Cifra (1616, 1618), the Scherzi e canzonette op.5 of Biagio Marini (1622) and the Scherzi di sacra melodia of Chiara Margarita Cozzolani (1648).

The term also appears during this period as the title of instrumental collections or multi-movement works. This seems to have originated with collections intended more for playing than for singing. Puliti's may be the earliest; in spite of the words 'per cantar', no texts are provided. The same applies to Antonio Troilo's Sinfonie, scherzi ... per cantar et sonar (1608). The earliest specifically instrumental publication is Cangiasi's Scherzi forastieri per suonare op.8 (1614). Later publications of the 17th and early 18th centuries, by Francesco Asioli (1674), G.A. Guido (*c*1720), Johann Martin Rubert (1650), G.M.

Ruggieri (1690), Johannes Schenck (1698), G.P. Telemann (1731, 1734) and J.J. Walther (1676) are unambiguously instrumental. Scherzos may be suites (Rubert, Schenck), studies (Troilo, Asioli), solo sonatas (Walther), trio sonatas (Ruggieri, Telemann – III trietti methodici e III scherzi and Scherzi melodichi) and concertos (Guido's Scherzi armonici sopra le quattro stagioni dell'anno, concerti op.3).

In the early 18th century, scherzos began to appear as movements within larger works. This continued up to the time of Haydn's op.33 string quartets (1781), some works by Beethoven and on into the 20th century. A few such pieces are finales but most, especially after op.33, are dance movements and primarily serve, in effect, as replacements where a minuet would be expected. Examples from before op.33 appear in works by Bonporti (Invenzioni, 1712), J.S. Bach (A minor Partita, BWV827), J.J. Agrell, W.F. Bach, F.F. Hengsberger, C.F. Hurlebusch, J.M. Kraus, Karl von Ordonez and Henri-Joseph Rigel, as well as in other works by Haydn himself (for example his Piano Sonata HXVI:9, finale). Nearly all of these are in duple metre and lack any trio section; almost half are finales. In the 19th century scherzos occur in non-traditional cycles such as Schumann's Ouvertüre, Scherzo und Finale op.52 (1841) and Liszt's Faust Symphony (1857: as 'Mephistopheles', the finale).

The earliest examples of scherzos as independent movements are three by J.S. Bach (BWV844, Anh.134 and 148), of which the last two, for musical clock, probably date from his Köthen period. Leopold Mozart included two scherzos, one of them attributed to Wagenseil, in his Notebook for Nannerl (1759). Some of the examples that appear to belong to this category may in fact have been extracted from multi-movement works. Again, most of these examples are in duple metre and lack trios.

This type of scherzo flourished in the 19th century piano literature; the numerous examples include the four scherzos of Chopin, and one by Brahms. Many were written or arranged for piano four hands. Piano scherzos are usually either virtuoso display pieces (such as those by Sigismond Thalberg, Edward Wolff and Stephen Heller, from around 1840) or character-pieces or a combination of those. The orchestral scherzo appeared during the first half of the 19th century, an early example being that by Clara Wieck (WOO5, by 1831); it gained importance later in the century and in the early 20th with works by Dvořák, Dukas (L'apprenti sorcier, 1897), Goldmark and Stravinsky.

Some scherzos have been composed or published in groups, as sets of instrumental pieces. An early example is Salieri's Scherzi istrumentali a quattro di stile fugato (late 18th century). In the early 19th century several such collections for keyboard were published, including J.G.H. Voigt's 6 Scherzos op.22 for piano four hands (reviewed in AMZ, 1810); the genre continued in modest numbers in the solo and four-hand literature. Two rare programmatic sequences are T. Oesten's Olympische Spiele: 3 Scherzi op.113 (1857: wrestling, discus throwing and boxing are the sports) and A.M. de Pusch's 3 Scherzos depicting morning, noon and evening.

2. HAYDN, BEETHOVEN. The scherzo's decisive admission to the canon of movements in regular Classical usage dates from Haydn's quartets op.33 (1781), sometimes known as 'Gli scherzi' since the movement that would then conventionally have been a minuet is headed either 'scherzando' or 'scherzo'. Haydn's intention with this unusual title is not clear, since the movements are not, as a body, lighter or more humorous than his usual type of minuet, and one (no.3) is decidedly serious, even sombre, in colour. Playfulness and jocularity are frequent enough in Haydn's music, but instead of concentrating these qualities into a regular alternative to the minuet in his sonatas and symphonies, he preferred to exploit the scherzo spirit in his finales, as for instance in two of the piano sonatas (HXVI:50 and 51) written in London in 1794.

It was Beethoven who established the scherzo as a regular alternative to the minuet and as a classic movement-type. From his earliest works the scherzo appears regularly in place of the minuet, and he took the term literally by giving the movement a light and often humorous tone. His scherzos are generally, too, very swift. His need for variety at this juncture was all the greater since he presumed from the beginning, unlike Haydn and Mozart, that piano sonatas and the smaller chamber combinations might embrace the full four-movement design, like symphonies and quartets. As early as op.10 he was having doubts about this and four movements ceased to be a regular quota in such works. Schindler recorded that towards the end of his life Beethoven was contemplating revising some of his earlier works and removing the scherzos.

The wind octet of 1792, published posthumously as op.103, is his first true scherzo, anticipating that of the Septet op.20. The scherzo of the Piano Trio op.1 no.1 is very fast and brittle, with a touch of humour and a clear sense of one pulse to a bar, quite foreign to the minuet. The second Trio of op.1 also has a scherzo, this time employing cross-accents, another favourite feature of Beethoven's scherzos that reaches an extreme point in the string quartets op.18 no.6 and op.135. With his highly sophisticated sense of musical humour, Beethoven often invested his scherzos with elements of surprise or caprice. The Quartet op.18 no.2 has a scherzo with very short, flippant phrases in rapid exchange and some Haydnesque surprises. The most unashamedly capricious of his scherzos is that in the 'Spring' Sonata op.24, where the violin and piano seem constantly out of step with one another. The Violin Sonata op.30 no.2 in C minor is similarly whimsical, and the Cello Sonata in A op.69 has a scherzo of teasing syncopations.

It was Beethoven's introduction of the scherzo into the symphony that was to have the most far-reaching effect. The First Symphony's third movement is marked 'Menuetto' (this is surprising when he had already given the title 'scherzo' to less scherzo-like pieces; though some scherzos are found marked as minuets in the sketchbooks); its pace marks it as something altogether different from the Classical minuet. Thereafter all his symphonies contain scherzos except the Eighth, where the movement is marked 'Tempo di menuetto'. The title 'scherzo' is in fact found only in the Second and Third. In his symphonic scherzos Beethoven generated great forward momentum by a combination of pace and rapidly alternating textures, and he maintained the Classical tradition of offering a different speed or character, or both, in his trios. The symphonies, too, show the broadest expansion of form in scherzo movements, beginning with the 'Eroica' with its tripartite trio and its written-out da capo, this time pianissimo and leading to a forceful coda. With second and fourth movements grown to so large a scale, the scherzo's form expanded correspondingly. The Fifth Symphony's scherzo is linked to the finale, during which it reappears. In the Fourth and Seventh Symphonies the trios appear twice, and in the Seventh there is a further brief reference to the trio before the coda. The scherzo of the Ninth, which comes second in order rather than in the more traditional (but by no means invariable) third place, is both humorous in its unpredictable opening and sophisticated in its rapid fugal textures, and is developed on a scale to match that of the whole symphony.

In his middle and late periods Beethoven did not always give titles to movements of scherzo-like character; and by the time of the late quartets he introduced movements in 2/4 or 4/4 where the effect of a scherzo is obviously intended. The Presto movements of op.127 and op.131 illustrate this clearly, even though scherzos in time signatures other than 3/4 are found much earlier. In the String Trio op.9 no.3 the scherzo is in 6/8. The finale of the Piano Sonata op.14 no.2, entitled 'Scherzo', is an extended movement in 3/8, and the Piano Sonatas op.31 no.3 and op.110 both have scherzos in 2/4. Beethoven often used the terms 'scherzando' and 'scherzoso', not so much of true scherzos but as an indication of character and pace, especially in his jog-trot Allegretto movements such as the second movement of op.18 no.4. In the String Quartet op.127 the Andante con moto is marked 'poco scherzoso'.

In the wake of Beethoven the scherzo can be said to be normal in Schubert's sonatas and symphonies, where the two halves of the outer section have grown from the simple binary pattern of the Classical minuet into an expanded movement, often, as in the 'Great' C major Symphony, in full sonata form. His trios provide lyrical contrast, generally with a change of key and character. In Spohr's output minuets and scherzos are equally common, and in Hummel's Septet op.74 a movement is headed 'minuet or scherzo'. A new and dazzling aspect of the scherzo was revealed by Mendelssohn's brilliant studies in fleetness of foot, known best in the scherzos of the Octet (1825) and of the music to A Midsummer Night's Dream (1843). Mendelssohn's fairy-like touch extends to other movements besides scherzos, as for example the last movements of the 'Italian' Symphony and the Violin Concerto, and the scherzos, many of them in duple time, are unfailingly light; the delicate pianissimo ending is almost a mannerism. Other fine examples are found in the String Quintet in A op.18, the String Quartet in E minor op.44 no.2 and the Piano Trios opp.49 and 66. Some of his scherzos dispense with a trio.

3. Later repertory. Berlioz's 'Queen Mab' scherzo in Roméo et Juliette (1839), a tour de force of gossamer orchestration, owes something to Mendelssohn's model, and so do a number of Schumann examples, including that in the Piano Quartet op.47. But Schumann and Brahms, especially the latter, were generally content to build scherzos after Beethoven's pattern. Schumann particularly favoured the alternation with more than one trio. Because Brahms avoided the conventional scherzo in his symphonies it has been said that the scherzo was not congenial to him, but this was by no means true, and he is to be credited with introducing a scherzo into the Piano Concerto in B♭ op.83 as an additional movement, an idea that was originally put forward by Schumann and put into practice by Litolff in his 'concerto-symphonies'. In Brahms's First and Third Symphonies the scherzo is replaced by a lyrical movement of moderate tempo, but neither light nor jocular in tone. In the Second Symphony the scherzo and trio are seemingly inverted as well as being thematically linked. The Fourth Symphony contains, in Tovey's words, 'the greatest scherzo since Beethoven', a 2/4 movement of intense seriousness and energy. Mendelssohn's delicacy and Beethoven's humour are absent from Brahms's scherzos, but they can be swift, as in the C major Piano Trio op.87, or rhythmically teasing, as in the Sonatensatz for violin and piano. Furthermore Brahms was fond of combining slow movement and scherzo in a single movement, as in the A major Violin Sonata op.100 – an idea which goes back to Beethoven's Serenade op.8 and which was also fruitfully taken up by Lalo in his Cello Concerto.

While in the later 19th century the scherzo was sometimes replaced by a dance movement of national character, as by Dvořák with the furiant, or by a balletic movement, as by Tchaikovsky with the waltz, its standing as a symphonic movement has remained essentially unchallenged, indeed strengthened by its wholehearted acceptance by all major symphonists from Bruckner to Shostakovich. Bruckner's range of scherzos is somewhat narrow, since he favoured a heavy scherzo of great rhythmic impetus with much emphasis on the regular barline. The trios normally offer quiet contrast, with ländler-type sections in the earlier symphonies. In the last two symphonies the scherzo is placed second, not third, following the example of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Mahler too adopted the ländler, as for example in his First, Fifth and Ninth Symphonies, but he could also give the scherzo a touch of grotesquerie, as in the Fourth Symphony with its scordatura violin, and even horror, as in the Sixth and Seventh Symphonies. The grotesque is more evident than the jocular in the scherzos of Prokofiev and Shostakovich; Vaughan Williams has a scherzo of pure diablerie in his Sixth Symphony, while Walton marked the scherzo of his First Symphony 'Presto, con malizia'. It is significant that in Holst's The Planets it is Uranus the Magician that evokes a scherzo, not Jupiter the Bringer of Jollity; and in Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra the second movement is entitled 'Giuoco delle coppie': though it is a joke, it is not a scherzo.

As an independent movement, detached from the frame of sonata or symphony, the scherzo came vigorously to life with Chopin's four scherzos, all of which are extended works, broadly ternary in structure (except for the Scherzo in C sharp minor) and presto in 3/4 time. Brahms's Scherzo op.4 is of the same kind, with two trios. Smaller unattached scherzos are found in Schumann. Independent orchestral movements of a scherzo type followed, and a number of symphonic poems exploited the scherzo's attributes of grotesquerie, delicacy, or speed. Saint-Saëns's Danse macabre is a scherzo in diabolic vein, and Dukas' L'apprenti sorcier, subtitled 'scherzo', is both swift and jocular. Strauss's Burleske for piano and orchestra was originally entitled 'Scherzo', and his Till Eulenspiegel is a scherzo in all but name. With models like Stravinsky's Scherzo fantastique and Scherzo à la Russe, scherzos for orchestra or other instruments, even for voices, were common during the 20th century.

4. Related terminology. A number of terms related to 'scherzo' occasionally appear, among them the performance direction 'scherzando' and the diminutive

'scherzetto'. 'Scherzando' ('jokingly'), from the gerund of scherzare, is used primarily as a performing direction and as a title, usually as the heading of a movement. It is also, exceptionally, the title of six small-scale, four-movement works by Haydn (HII:33–8), written before 1765, and also a further set of works advertised alongside these in the Breitkopf catalogue of 1765. Variants include 'scherzante' ('joking'), preferred by Ordonez; its superlative, 'scherzantissimo', appears in Salieri's Scherzi istrumentali. A commoner variant, derived directly from scherzo, is 'scherzoso' (literally 'joke-full', or 'playful'), used by Beethoven and others; a further variant is 'scherzevole'.

Loosely used by musicians, 'scherzando' may serve equally as noun or modifier. As a movement title, it appears from 1770 onwards, sometimes coupled with a tempo or movement designation ('Allegro scherzando', 'Rondo scherzando'). It was used from the early 18th century as a performing direction. Whether or not the 'scherzando' for the gigue following Pachelbel's canon is authentic, it is used in the overtures of five lute or keyboard suites by Telemann (TWV3:32/5–9, undated). From the 1760s it is applied predominantly to finales, probably replacing minuet-finales just as scherzos would replace minuets. A scherzando finale of a keyboard sonata by C.S. Binder dates from about 1761. Many such movements are in 6/8 metre. Three scherzando finales of Haydn symphonies (nos.42, 46 and 66) present his typical comic techniques but are by no means unique among his finales, and it is clear that the term does not indicate a specific type of movement. By the first decade of the 19th century there are fewer scherzando finales but the number of dance-type movements bearing the title increases: such movements tend to follow the familiar minuet pattern of triple metre and da capo form. The Allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in duple metre, is an unusual but not unique example of a scherzando slow movement, with a minuet to follow as the dance movement. From the late 18th century onwards there are examples of scherzando movements published individually, sometimes as supplements to journals or as parts of longer, non-cyclic works or collections; 'Rondo [Rondoletto, Rondino] scherzando' remained a popular subgenre from the 1820s to the end of the century. Examples of published sets include P.L.L. Benoit's 2 Scherzandos op.3 (Leipzig, before 1860).

Two diminutives of scherzo are 'scherzino' and 'scherzetto'. The former is the more widely used; among the first to use it was Schumann, Faschingsschwank aus Wien op.26 (1839–40); there is also a brief Scherzino (1832) in his Albumblätter op.124. The term continued in use throughout the 19th century either for a movement in a cycle of piano miniatures or for a character-piece, less often for an independent work (an example is Czerny's Scherzino alla tarantella, op.763). 'Scherzetto', which appears in the second half of the century, is applied more often to individual pieces than to movements within longer works. The whimsicality implicit in these terms is exemplified in Alkan's usage in his 48 motifs op.63 – one a 'scherzetto' with a 'trioletto', the other a 'scherzettino'. None of these terms necessarily indicates a composition significantly smaller (i.e. shorter, lighter or simpler) than an ordinary scherzo.

He was the son of the Edinburgh cellist and composer J.G.C. Schetky and a nephew of Alexander Reinagle. Schetky emigrated to the USA in 1787 and became active as a performer and music teacher in Philadelphia, where he lived with the musicians Benjamin Carr and Joseph C. Taws. With Carr he was co-editor of The Musical Journal for the Piano Forte (vols.iii–v) and published music from about 1802 to 1811. Between 1812 and 1818 he apparently visited Britain, for he published piano compositions by his father and himself in London and Edinburgh. He was a co-founder in 1820 of the Musical Fund Society in Philadelphia, which owns a portrait of him.

ANNE DHU MCLUCAS

Schetky, Johann Georg Christoph (b Darmstadt, 19 Aug 1737; d Edinburgh, 30 Nov 1824). German composer and cellist, father of J. George Schetky. He was born and brought up at the court of Hesse-Darmstadt, where his father, Ernst Gottlieb Schetky (1716–67), was secretary and musician in the service of Landgrave Ludwig VIII. He is said to have studied law at Jena University. At 15 he applied for the post of principal cellist in the Darmstadt orchestra, and he was on the court musicians' payroll from 1758. He studied composition with Endler, the court vice-Kapellmeister, and cello with Anton Fils, who was in service at nearby Mannheim. With his entire family (his brother Georg Carl Jacob, two sisters Charlotta Louise Dorothea and Ludomilla, and his father), he went to Hamburg in 1763 to give concerts; Schetky's aria Conservati fidele pensa for soprano, obbligato cello and strings dates from this time. The concerts were so successful that his father wrote to Darmstadt asking for the family's release from court employment, but was refused. Schetky remained a Darmstadt musician until 1768, though able to travel and give freelance concerts at other courts. He then returned to Hamburg (1768–9) and went to London (early 1772), where he was persuaded by the publisher and agent Robert Bremner to accept the post of principal cellist to the Edinburgh Musical Society.

Schetky at first intended to spend only one year in Edinburgh; but he married Maria Theresa (Mary) Reinagle, daughter of the émigré Austrian musician Joseph Reinagle (i), in 1774, had 11 children, and settled there for the rest of his life. In addition to a certain musical fame achieved by his son J. George Schetky, another son, John Christian Schetky (1778–1874), was Marine Painter-in-Ordinary to George IV, William IV and Queen Victoria. Schetky easily won a place in fashionable Edinburgh society. He was present at Burns's installation at the Kilwinning masonic lodge (1786); entertained the young Hummel during his Edinburgh visit (1788); set Burns's lyric Clarinda, Mistress of my Soul (1788); and directed the music at the foundation of Edinburgh University's Old Quadrangle (16 November 1789). He entertained Louis XVIII in exile at Holyrood Palace (1793), conducted the band of a famous amateur civil defence regiment, the Gentlemen Volunteers (1795), and set three of Walter Scott's lyrics, with the poet's approval (around 1810). He came out of retirement at 78 to play the cello in the first Edinburgh Musical Festival in 1815.

Schetky's career as a composer stretched from the 1760s to the second decade of the 19th century. His earliest works seem mainly to have been a means of publicizing his abilities as a cellist: they include sonatas, variations and concertos, as well as trios and even vocal works with cello obbligato, and only the three symphonies do not give the cello a prominent role. Other works often ascribed to his early period, an oratorio (actually by Graupner) and a flute trio probably by his brother, are misattributed. The youthful works are weak and dependent on cliché and sequence; the symphonies are pedestrian imitations of works by such Mannheim composers as Fils.

Schetky's compositions from his Edinburgh period are voluminous and, in general, far more polished. The buoyant market for music publishing which Britain enjoyed from 1760 to 1790 had a stimulating effect on his creativity, even though the standard of his output varied enormously. His op.6 quartets (1777; see illustration) are outstanding, a worthy forerunner to the mature quartets of Haydn and Mozart. First rate, too, is the Solo in E♭ op.4 no.4 (1776), a cello sonata which exploits the cello's instincts for bravura, wit and human warmth in a way only surpassed by the sonatas of Beethoven. In a quieter, more domestic way the Duet op.2 no.1 (1775) is also excellent, giving the violin and cello equal roles and dispensing with the need for a continuo instrument. Also notable are his arrangements of Scots tunes for military wind band (*c*1800), with their sensitive harmonizations and effective transference of ballroom fiddle tunes to the raucous new open-air medium. But his other cello sonatas are mere exercises in technique (though they sold well on the Continent); all his chamber music for and with piano is perfunctory; his songs have only a faded charm. The lost, unpublished pieces which he wrote for the Edinburgh Musical Society (several symphonies, cello concertos and a Pastorale on the Nativity) may well have included some of his finest work.

Title-page of Schetky's 'Six Quartettos' op.6 (London: Bremner, 1777); engraving by Ford Schetky also published two educational works about the cello, the essay Some Observations on, and Rules for Violoncello Playing (in his op.7, *c*1780), and Practical and Progressive Lessons for the Violoncello (London, 1811), which has notes on recitative accompaniment as well as copious advice on elementary technical matters.

DAVID JOHNSON, ROGER LARSSON

Scheuenstuhl, Michael (b Guttenstetten, Franconia, 3 March 1705; d Hof, 26 July 1770). German composer and organist. Apart from the few details recorded in Mattheson's Grundlage, little is known of Scheuenstuhl's life. On 7 May 1722, when only 17, he became organist at the Hohenlohe residence in Wilhelmsdorf. Seven years later he moved to Hof, where he was organist at St Michael from 29 October 1729 until his death. From 1752 onwards he held an additional appointment as a schoolmaster at the local girls' school. Although an organist by profession, Scheuenstuhl was known primarily for his harpsichord pieces, several of which were published by Balthasar Schmidt of Nuremberg during the 1730s and 1740s. These unpretentious works were designed for the growing amateur market, and their lighthearted tone and galant style assured success. Scheuenstuhl was among those who contributed to the literature of the murky, a species of keyboard music cultivated in Germany from about 1730 to 1800, whose chief characteristic (apart from the tuneful quality of its melodies) was the presence of broken-octave figuration in the left hand. His only large-scale compositions were the keyboard concertos. Originally Scheuenstuhl intended to bring out six concertos, but only three seem to have been published. The G minor concerto for unaccompanied keyboard has been compared with Bach's Italian Concerto; Spitta thought Scheuenstuhl's work was directly inspired by Bach's, but although both concertos are written in the Italian manner there is nothing to suggest any closer relationship between the two.

Scheurleer, Daniel François (b The Hague, 13 Nov 1855; d The Hague, 6 Feb 1927). Dutch musicologist. He had many amateur historical interests and paid particular attention to the study of music and its history. He devoted years to the collection of musical source materials and European and non-European instruments, which he then housed in his private museum. After his death his instrument collection and the larger part of his personal library went to the Gemeentemuseum of The Hague, and his source material for the history of Dutch monophonic song to the Royal Library of The Hague. His accomplishments as an administrator were no less important; he served on the boards of directors of the Vereeniging voor Nederlandse Muziekgeschiedenis and the Union Musicologique, which he founded in 1921 to help re-establish international scholarly contacts broken by World War I. He was granted the honorary doctorate by the University of Leiden in 1920 and was named honorary president of the 1924 musicological congress in Basle.

Scheurleer's foremost importance, apart from his administrative work, lies in his activities as a collector. The Netherlands is indebted to him for its splendid instrument museum, and his studies and compilations of the sources of 18th-century Dutch music history and Dutch monophonic song of the Renaissance are of high scholarly merit.

Schiassi, Gaetano Maria (b Bologna, 10 March 1698; d Lisbon, 1754). Italian composer. Born of Bolognese parents, Carl Antonio Schiassi and Catterina Minghetti, he was a member of the Accademia Filarmonica as a suonatore, and a violinist among the virtuosos at the ducal court of Alderano Cybo Malaspina, to whom he dedicated his Trattenimenti per camera in 1724. About three years later he was employed by the Landgrave of Darmstadt. During this period several of his operas and oratorios were performed on Italian stages; Barilli noted that his setting of Didone abbandonata was extremely successful ('incontrò a meraviglia'). Of special interest is his comedy La Zanina finta contessa, partly written in Bolognese dialect in the manner of G.M. Buini.

From at least the end of 1734 he lived in Lisbon, where he served in the royal chapel and founded the Academia da Trindade. His letters from Lisbon to Padre Giambattista Martini from 3 January 1735 to 30 September 1753 (now in I-Bc) reveal his activities there as composer, teacher and singer. He was asked to compose oratorios based on texts by Metastasio, for which he enlisted Martini's help in supplying fugues for the choruses. The letters also reveal several insights into performing practice and taste in 18th-century Lisbon, where the king refused to allow women to take roles in operas and prohibited all kinds of entertainment during his illness except for oratorios and church festivals. Schiassi also obtained several important books for Martini's library, including a copy of Cerone's rare El melopeo.

Schiassi's training as a violinist is reflected in his instrumental writing, which often demands a high level of virtuosity and reflects a good understanding of the instrument. Forms include sonatas, sinfonias, concertos and dance pieces for combinations of one to four instruments with continuo. The vocal music is often written in a pastoral style similar to that of Bolognese composers like G.A. Perti in the first half of the 18th century.

ANNE SCHNOEBELEN

Schiavetto [Schiavetti], Giulio [Skjavetić, Julije] (b Šibenik; fl 1562–5). Croatian composer. He came from a Šibenik family, appearing in local registers under the Croatian names of Schiavetich, Schavetich or Scavetich between the years 1520 and 1697. He may have been in the service of Girolamo Savorgnano, Bishop of Šibenik (1523–91), to whom he dedicated some of his works.

Though he seems not to have contributed to the more extended contemporary forms such as the mass, some of Schiavetto's motets are conceived on an expansive scale, and both his sacred and secular works are of the highest craftsmanship. The quality of his creative output makes him one of the most important Croatian musicians of his time and ranks him among the finest composers of the prima pratica.

LOVRO ŽUPANOVIĆ

Schibler, Armin (b Kreuzlingen, 20 Nov 1920; d Zürich, 7 Sept 1986). Swiss composer. He studied the piano and composition in Zürich with Müller, Frey and Burkhard, and in England with Tippett (1946). His work was also decisively influenced by the Darmstadt summer courses (1949–53) given by Fortner, Leibowitz, Krenek and Adorno. From 1944 he taught music at the Zürich grammar school, where he exerted a considerable influence on the next generation of Swiss composers. As a young man he was one of Switzerland's best-known composers, writing in a style dominated by that of Burkhard. In about 1950 he turned to 12-note techniques; this interest continued for some years, although Schibler was never completely won over to the method. Die späte Sühne is the main work from this rather Expressionist period. The following years were influenced by Stravinskian rhythm and by a ballet course directed by Harald Kreutzberg.

Schibler's lively interest in all contemporary music led him to an involvement with jazz in connection with dance, notably in the burlesque Blackwood & Co. His most ambitious essay in combining popular and classical music is the Concerto 77 (1975–7). Through Adorno he became aware of the sociological implications of music, and this brought about his use of melodramatic techniques in drawing reciprocal relationships between words and music. He himself wrote many of the texts that he set to music.

FRITZ MUGGLER/CHRIS WALTON

Schicht (Ger.). See LAYER.

Schicht, Johann Gottfried (b Reichenau [now Bogatynia], nr Zittau, 29 Sept 1753; d Leipzig, 16 Feb 1823). German conductor, keyboard player and composer. He was brought up by his uncle at Zittau, where he was first taught to play keyboard instruments by the organist Johann Trier. From 1776, when he went to Leipzig University to study law, he played in the concerts at the inn 'Zu den drei Schwänen' (the 'Grosses Concert') under the direction of Hiller. Abandoning the law, he also played under Hiller in the Musikübende Gesellschaft and from 1781 played the violin in the Gewandhaus concerts. In 1785 he succeeded Hiller as musical director of the Gewandhaus concerts and subsequently of the Neukirche. He founded the Leipzig Singakademie in 1802, directed it until 1807 and became the university's musical director in 1808. In 1810 he succeeded August Müller as Kantor of the Thomasschule in Leipzig, where he attained a high standard of performance. His wife, the Italian singer Costanza Valdesturla, sang at the Gewandhaus concerts for many years before her death in 1809.

Schicht is remembered more for his Allgemeine Choralbuch (Leipzig, 1819) than for his sacred vocal works (motets, oratorios, masses, Te Deum settings and cantatas etc.) or his secular vocal or instrumental works. Formally and stylistically, his compositions are indistinguishable from those of many of his contemporaries and present nothing new. Schicht paid careful attention, however, to text declamation: his unaccompanied vocal works are superior to those with functional orchestral accompaniments. Important as an early editor of chorale preludes, a mass, and five motets by Bach, he also wrote a treatise on harmony (1812) and translated pedagogical works by Clementi, Pleyel and Pellegrini-Celloni. Among his students were Marschner, Reissiger and Zöllner.

GAYNOR G. JONES

Schick, (Johan) Ernst (Christoph) (b The Hague, 1 Oct 1753; d Berlin, 10 Dec 1815). Dutch violinist and composer. His father took him to Amsterdam, intending him to follow his own career of dancing-master. The boy's musical talent was discovered by J.A. Kreusser, who taught him the violin; he soon became a virtuoso player, emulating the style of Michael Esser and Lolli. In 1773 he followed his teacher's brother G.A. Kreusser to Mainz and became chamber musician in the electoral Kapelle there. In 1791 he married the singer Margarete Hamel. He was appointed violinist in the Berlin court orchestra in 1793, and leader in 1813. In 1804 with K.M. Bohrer he organized subscription concerts at which lesser-known Classical works were heard; at one of these, Beethoven's Second Symphony was performed. His compositions – six violin concertos and masonic songs – were never widely known.

GAYNOR G. JONES/JAN TEN BOKUM

Schickaneder. See SCHIKANEDER family.

Schickele, (Johann) Peter (b Ames, IA, 17 July 1935). American composer, arranger and humorist. He studied music with Sigvald Thompson (1950–52) at Swarthmore College (BA 1957), spending the summer of 1954 as a composition pupil of Roy Harris in Pittsburgh and 1958 with Milhaud at the Aspen Music School, then went to the Juilliard School (MS 1960), where he continued his composition studies with Persichetti and Bergsma. He was awarded a Ford Foundation grant in 1960–61 as composer-in-residence to the Los Angeles high schools, then taught at Juilliard (1961–5).

In 1959, as a student, Schickele co-founded the Composers Circle, which presented concerts of contemporary works. In 1967 he founded a 'chamber-rock-jazz' trio, Open Window, with which he performed many of his serious works until 1971. His prolific compositions under his own name show a diversity of influences including jazz, rock and non-tonal styles. His major works, including four string quartets and a symphony, are strongly tonal, often structured through contrasts of texture, dynamics, instrumentation, metre and mood. Schickele's fascination with both Stravinsky and the Everly Brothers is manifested in his eclectic style; for the most part his works are postmodern in their small forms, neo-romantic in their light, impressionistic textures and neo-classical in their instrumentation. Childhood interests in chamber music, pop and rock songs, theatre and the slapstick burlesque of songs by Spike Jones began to be incorporated into his works when he invented 'P.D.Q. Bach', a persona through whom he lampooned Baroque and Classical music and the conventions of musicological writing. Pieces by P.D.Q. Bach, involving such contraptions as the left-handed sewer flute and the double-reed slide music stand, were presented in concerts at Juilliard and Aspen from 1957, and were first given in a public concert at Town Hall, New York (24 April 1965).

Schickele has become the leading American musical satirist, giving concerts throughout the USA in which he lectures, sings, conducts and plays as guest soloist with symphony orchestras or with his own ensemble. The humorous compositions range from outrageous parodies, such as the oratorio Iphigenia in Brooklyn, to ingenious combinations of antithetical styles, as in Blaues Gras (Bluegrass Cantata), and are full of surprising violations of familiar styles, musical forms and phrase structures, harmonic conventions and orchestration. Schickele's commentaries and his mock-scholarly The Definitive Biography of P.D.Q. Bach (1807–1742)? (New York, 1976) juxtapose incongruities from contemporary culture with relatively austere academic and classical canons, and are reflective of the eclectic musical menu of the modern American public. One of the most widely performed and published of contemporary composers working in many different styles, Schickele has written scores for television (including Sesame Street and a section of Fantasia 2000) and films, songs for musicals including Oh! Calcutta! (his ensemble was the original pit orchestra for the show), and arrangements and songs for Joan Baez, Buffy Sainte-Marie and other folk-revival singers. Through his weekly Public Radio International programme Schickele Mix (1992–), which won an ASCAP Deems Taylor Award (1993), he has educated audiences in music fundamentals across a wide spectrum of performing styles and genres. He has been awarded honorary doctorates by Swarthmore (1980) and North Dakota State University (1995). His P.D.Q. Bach recordings have won four Grammy awards for best comedy album of the year (1989–92).

Schickhardt [Schickhard], Johann Christian (b Brunswick, *c*1681; d Leiden, before 26 March 1762). German composer and instrumentalist. He received his musical training at the ducal court in Brunswick. The early part of his career was spent in the Netherlands in the service of Friedrich of Hessen-Kassel, Henriette Amalia of Anhalt-Dessau, and Johan Willem Friso, Prince of Orange. By 1711 he was in Hamburg, the city with which he was associated by Walther (1732) and Hawkins (1776), and lived there until at least 1718. But by 1717 he had connections with Johann Friedrich, Count of Kastel-Rudenhausen, and around 1719 with Ernst August of Saxe-Weimar and Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen. In the early 1720s he was probably in Scandinavia. In 1732, having 'lately arrived from Germany', he gave a concert in London consisting of his own concertos and chamber music for 'the small flute' (i.e. recorder). He stayed in London long enough to issue by subscription his collection of 24 sonatas, op.30, in all keys; most of the subscribers were Dutch, although the local contingent included such notables as Handel, P.A. Locatelli, Pepusch and De Fesch. 12 guitar suites of his appear in a manuscript compiled by Nathanael Diesel, a lutenist at the Danish Court, 1736–44, suggesting a connection with Copenhagen. He was attached to the University of Leiden in 1745; the Album studiosorum for that year gives his age as 63. After his death Schickhardt's daughter applied to the university authorities for assistance with burial expenses and from the subsequent act of Senate (26 March 1762) it is seen that he had been 'a master of musical arts and a member of the Academy'. Dart's suggestion that Schickhardt was related to the London instrument maker J.-J. Schuchart has proved unfounded.

Schickhardt had close associations with Estienne Roger, the Amsterdam publisher, and his successors, Jeanne Roger and Michel-Charles Le Cène. He not only provided the firm with a constant stream of original compositions, but also acted as its Hamburg agent around 1712 and undertook occasional editorial projects such as the arrangement of Corelli's op.6 for two recorders and continuo. A woodwind player himself, Schickhardt produced instruction manuals for both the recorder and oboe. But he was known primarily through his chamber music. His sonatas, although written in a conventional, post-Corellian idiom, reveal fine melodic gifts, striking harmonic touches, and a Handelian directness of expression. The widespread popularity of these works in the early 18th century is attested by both the flood of publications from Amsterdam and the speed with which they were pirated in London.

PIPPA DRUMMOND, DAVID LASOCKI

Schideman, David. See SCHEIDEMANN, DAVID.

Schidlowsky, León (b Santiago, 21 July 1931). Israeli composer of Chilean birth. While reading psychology and philosophy at the University of Chile (diploma 1952), he studied composition privately with Free Focke (1950–52); he continued his music studies at the Detmold Music Academy (1952–4). After returning to Chile in 1955, he became director of Tonus (1957), secretary general of the National Association of Composers (1961–3) and director of the Instituto de Extensión Musical (1962–6). He joined the composition department at the University of Chile in 1965. Following a year in Germany on a Guggenheim Fellowship (1968), Schidlowsky moved to Tel-Aviv, where he was appointed professor of composition at the Rubin Academy of Tel-Aviv University. His influence has been felt by a generation of Israeli composers, including Rachel Galinne, Betty Olivero, Ron Weidberg and Rubin Seroussi.

An admirer of Schoenberg's music and views, and Nono's political militancy through artistic progressiveness, Schidlowsky has written in a variety of styles, from free atonality, 12-note and integral serialism to aleatory and graphic composition. His dramatic, haunting Babi yar and Missa sine nomine, graphic works of the 1970s, celebrate the fundamental nature of sound, exploring sound clusters and glissandos that evolve from and towards elongated unisons. Percussive elements in both the voices and instruments play a significant role in these works, as they do in his many vehemently dramatic compositions. His post avant-garde music (from after 1982), such as the Piano Quartet (1988) and the orchestral work Absalom (1996), are traditionally notated and exhibit idiomatic and sonorous atonal writing. Many of his works refer to his Judaic and Israeli identity and to the history of the Jewish people. Kaddish, Kristallnacht, Invocación, Babi yar, In eius memoriam, Citizen 1230316, Nacht, Dybbuk and Absalom are only a few of many works in his large output that bear textual references either to the history of the Jews or to distinctly Israeli experiences. His music has received frequent performances in Germany; between 1979 and 1996 his graphic works were presented in 10 separate exhibitions and concerts throughout the country.

RONIT SETER

Schiedermair, Ludwig (b Regensburg, 7 Dec 1876; d Bensberg, 30 April 1957). German musicologist. He spent his school and university years at Munich where, in addition to history and German literature, he studied musicology under Sandberger and composition and music theory with Beer-Walbrunn. In 1901 he took the doctorate in Erlangen with a thesis on cultural life at the court of Elector Ferdinand Maria of Bavaria. After teaching history, geography and German at Würzburg (1903) he returned to musicology, first at Leipzig University, where he worked under Riemann, and then at Berlin, under Kretzschmar. Following extensive travels in Italy, he became lecturer in the history of music at Marburg University in 1906, submitting for this post a Habilitationsschrift on Mayr's operas. In 1911 he left Marburg for Bonn where, in 1915, he was appointed reader in music, and from 1920 he held the chair of music. After World War II he was forced to retire because of pro-Hitler and anti-Semitic passages in the 1940 edition of his book, Die deutsche Oper.

It was due to Schiedermair's active interest in Beethoven that in 1927 (the centenary year of Beethoven's death) the important Beethoven Archives came into being. With Schiedermair as founder and director this institute became the international centre for Beethoven research, gathering under one roof, either in the original or in photographic copies, not only the various editions of Beethoven's works but also his manuscripts and sketches scattered all over the world. In 1929, in connection with the Beethoven Archives, Schiedermair founded a department exclusively concerned with the musical history of the Rhineland, to which, in 1933, he added a publication department (now part of Cologne University music faculty). In recognition of his outstanding contributions to music bibliography and history, Schiedermair was elected president of the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Musikwissenschaft in 1937 and in the following year arranged the first musicological conference in the Third Reich (with the theme 'Music and Race') at the Reichsmusiktage in Düsseldorf. He was elected chairman of the music section of the Deutsche Akademie in 1940, and received the Goldene Mozart-Medaille in 1941 from the city of Salzburg and Silberne Mozart-Medaille in 1942 from the city of Vienna.

Schiedermair's main interests were Mozart and Beethoven. He was the first to attempt a complete edition of Mozart's letters, and Die Briefe W.A. Mozarts und seiner Familie (1914) was published in four volumes, with a fifth volume of pictures relating to Mozart and his time. This edition formed the basis of Emily Anderson's English translation of the letters. Other standard works were his Mozart: sein Leben und seine Werke (1922), Der junge Beethoven (1925) and Die deutsche Oper (1930).

EDITH B. SCHNAPPER/PAMELA M. POTTER

Schiedmayer. The name of two German firms of piano makers. The first was set up in 1809 by Johann Lorenz Schiedmayer (b Erlangen, 2 Dec 1786; d Stuttgart, 3 April 1860) and his partner Carl Dieudonné (d 1825) in Stuttgart. Johann's grandfather, Balthasar Schiedmayer (b Erlangen, 25 Oct 1711; d Erlangen, 5 Oct 1781), and father, Johann David Schiedmayer (b Erlangen, 20 April 1753; d Nuremberg, 24 March 1805), had both been well-established piano makers, the latter working with J.A. Stein at Augsburg from 1778 to 1781. Johann Lorenz soon became a well-known maker nationally, competing successfully with imports from Vienna, Paris and London. Upright pianos were produced as early as 1842. The business became Schiedmayer & Söhne in 1845 when his sons, Adolf (b Stuttgart, 1819; d Stuttgart, 17 Oct 1890) and Hermann (b Stuttgart, 1820; d Stuttgart, 1861), joined in partnership. The firm made concert and domestic instruments, winning many prizes, notably a gold medal at the London Great Exhibition of 1851.

A second, independent firm was founded in 1853 by the younger sons of Johann Lorenz Schiedmayer, Julius (b Stuttgart, 17 Feb 1822; d Stuttgart, Feb 1878) and Paul (b Kissingen, 1829; d Stuttgart, 18 June 1890). Paul had studied instrument making with Debain and Alexandre in Paris, and this experience enabled him and his brother to make harmoniums as J. & P. Schiedmayer (see REED ORGAN, §I). By the time their father died in 1860, the upright piano was superseding the harmonium, so they started making pianos. This competition with the older firm resulted in the production of good instruments by both. The newer firm had a larger output than the older one, and it subsequently developed a better reputation. Julius established a family tradition by acting as juror at important exhibitions, from the 1862 London Exhibition on. J. & P. Schiedmayer itself won the Grand Prix at the Paris Exposition Universelle of 1900.

When the two firms merged in 1969, J. & P. Schiedmayer (which had become known as Schiedmayer Pianofortefabrik) ceased production with a total of 69,618 instruments; the serial numbers of Schiedmayer & Söhne therefore jumped from 54797 (1968) to 124593 (1969), reaching 126664 in 1979. The company stopped making pianos in 1980. The Schiedmayer Celestabau GmbH was founded in 1995 with Elianne Schiedmayer as director. It specializes in the production of celestas and keyboard glockenspiels.

MARGARET CRANMER

Schiefferdecker [Schieferdecker], Johann Christian (b Teuchern, nr Weissenfels, 10 Nov 1679; d Lübeck, 5 April 1732). German organist and composer. The son of Christian Schiefferdecker, Kantor, organist and teacher at Teuchern, he came of a long line of ministers and church musicians active in Weissenfels and Zeitz from the middle of the 17th century. He attended the Leipzig Thomasschule, 1692–7; later, while a university student in Leipzig, two of his operas were staged. In 1702 he became accompanist to the Hamburg Opera, where he collaborated with G. Bronner and J. Mattheson on Victor, Hertzog der Normannen, which was performed to celebrate the coronation of Queen Anne. His Alaricus and a revision of Regnerus, originally written for Weissenfels, were staged in the same year. On 23 January 1707 Schiefferdecker succeeded Buxtehude as organist and parish clerk of the Marienkirche, Lübeck, after acting as his deputy for a year. In accordance with local custom, he married his predecessor's daughter, Anna Margreta (his senior by four years), on 5 September 1707.

Since Lübeck's importance lay in the cultivation of sacred music, Schiefferdecker focussed his attention on the church. He continued the Marienkirche tradition inaugurated by Tunder of providing sacred music for the annual series of concerts (Abendmusiken) given around Advent. To the existing modest resources of one violist and one lutenist the authorities in 1709 allowed Schiefferdecker to add another violist. For each season from 1707 to 1729 he wrote a cantata comprising recitatives, solos, choruses and a chorale sung by the congregation with a concluding hymn either in praise of the ruler or of intercession for the city's well-being. No Abendmusiken are recorded for 1731 or 1732. According to Moller, Schiefferdecker also wrote a series of Geistliche Cantaten nach Ordnung der Sonn- und festtäglichen Evangelien.

G.B. SHARP/DOROTHEA SCHRÖDER

Schierbeck, Poul (Julius Ouscher) (b Copenhagen, 8 June 1888; d Copenhagen, 9 Feb 1949). Danish composer. In 1906, while engaged in law studies, he began composition lessons with Nielsen and Laub; he also studied the piano, the organ and conducting. He served as an artillery lieutenant during World War I, but continued to pursue his musical interests: in 1916 he was appointed organist of Skovshoved Church, a post he held until his death. Appointed to the staff of the Royal Danish Conservatory in 1931, he became an influential teacher of composition and instrumentation. Among the honours he received were the Anckerske Legat (1919), the Lange-Müller Aeresstipendium (1926) and membership of the Royal Swedish Academy of Music (1947).

Schierbeck made an important contribution to the literature of Danish song. His early style was less attuned to the new folklike idiom of Nielsen and Laub than to the more romantic manner of Lange-Müller, but the later songs, such as Alverden gaar omkring ('The World Goes Round'), op.42, a collection which describes the cycle of life, are closer to the former two composers. In addition to art songs, he composed valuable material for Danish children's songbooks. Among the occasional pieces he was always ready to provide, the Kantate ved Københavns Universitets Immatrikulationsfest op.16 has become a traditional part of the university's annual ceremonies. His Symphony was first conducted by Nielsen at Göteborg in 1922.

From 1923 to 1930 Schierbeck worked on the opera Fête galante, whose first performance at the Kongelige Teater, Copenhagen, was directed by Schiøler, with Sylvia Larsen, the composer's wife, as Suzon. Although the piece was well received by the public, the critics all commented on its excessive length, and it was taken off after six performances. Schierbeck undertook revisions in the expectation of further stagings, but it was not until after his death that a shortened version was broadcast by Danish radio (1949), and there was no complete performance again until the opera returned to the Kongelige Teater in 1960; that production met with success, but the work failed to gain a place in the repertory. Disappointed by the problems surrounding his opera, Schierbeck found an outlet for his inclination towards dramatic composition in Tiggerens opera, an arrangement of The Beggar's Opera, and in collaborating with the Danish film maker Carl Theodor Dreyer. The most impressive product of this partnership was Vredens dag ('Day of wrath'), whose score employs a cantus firmus treatment of the Dies irae chant. After Schierbeck's death Dreyer made use of his music in the soundtrack for Ordet ('The word'). Since the 1980s, a number of Schierbeck's works have been recorded on the Da Capo, Danacord and Point Music labels.

WILLIAM H. REYNOLDS/ODDVIN MATHISEN

Schieti [Schietti], Cesare (b Urbino; d Urbino, 8 Jan 1600). Italian composer. He was a priest, and succeeded Francesco Lupino as maestro di cappella of Urbino Cathedral from at least 1 December 1555 to 8 January 1576, except for a brief period at Ravenna in the service of Cardinal Giulio Feltrio della Rovere between October 1566 and February 1567. In November 1575 he was appointed to a canonry at the cathedral and between 1584 and 1593 is recorded as a member of the administrative body. He was maestro di cappella there again from 15 January 1593 to 30 September 1596, and between 10 June and September 1598. Four years before his death he instituted the office of coristaria with funds inherited from his brother Marc'Antonio; a plaque in the sacristy records the chapter's gratitude for his generosity. He was very influencial on the musical life of Urbino, where he was involved with the confraternities, particularly that of Corpus Domini. The six-voice Missa 'Lucubratio' demonstrates his mastery of contrapuntal technique, particularly in the last Agnus Dei constructed on a double canon. In 1599 a volume of motets and psalms (RISM 1599²) containing works by Felice Anerio, Marenzio, G.M. Nanino and Palestrina in addition to three of his own works was dedicated to him.

PIER PAOLO SCATTOLIN

Schiever, Ernst (b Hanover, 23 March 1844; d Hanover, 1915). German violinist. He studied with Joachim in Hanover from 1860 to 1864. In 1868 he replaced Auer as first violinist in the Müller Quartet, travelling extensively with them until the quartet dissolved in 1869, when he became a founder member of the Joachim Quartet, as second violinist, and began teaching at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin. During his two years in Berlin he organized his own quartet with Herman Franke, Leonhard Wolff and Robert Hausmann which was eventually engaged by Count Hochberg as the Gräflich Hochberg Quartet of Schloss Rohnstock. In 1878 Schiever moved to England and settled in Liverpool, where he became leader of the Richter orchestra, a post he held for nearly 30 years. With A. Ross, Carl Courvoisier and Walter Hatton he founded the Schiever Quartet, which long enjoyed great esteem in the north of England.

JOHN MORAN

Schiff, András (b Budapest, 21 Dec 1953). Hungarian pianist. His teachers in Budapest at the Franz Liszt Academy were Pál Kadosa, György Kurtág and Ferenc Rados, and he also studied with George Malcolm in London. He was a prizewinner at the Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow in 1974 and at the Leeds International Competition the following year. His first solo recording, made in London, a sparkling and imaginative set of the Mozart sonatas (Decca, 1978), established him as an outstanding musician-pianist; the freshness of his Bach also attracted much attention around this time, when few recitalists were attempting to reclaim Bach for the piano. In the 1980s he made débuts with the New York PO, the Concertgebouw Orchestra, the Vienna PO and the Berlin PO but by the end of that decade it was the independent, venturesome spirit in him that had come to the fore. Cycles and carefully planned series of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann and Bartók (the core of his repertory) continue to form an important part of his activities. His Haydn festival in the Wigmore Hall, London, won the Royal Philharmonic Society/Charles Heidsieck Award for the best concert series of 1988–9, and in 1989 he was awarded the Wiener Flötenuhr, the Mozart Prize of the City of Vienna. In 1994 he received the Claudio Arrau memorial medal of the Schumann Society in Düsseldorf, and in 1996 the Kossuth Prize (the highest Hungarian honour). He now moves easily between solo recitals, concertos, ensemble playing, recitals with singers (notably Peter Schreier) and instrumentalists, conducting and, increasingly, directing performances of concertos of Bach, Mozart and Beethoven from the keyboard. The distinction with which he fulfils all these roles recalls Edwin Fischer, and he shares something of Fischer's crusading zeal.

Schiff was the founder and the artistic director from 1989 to 1998 of the annual Musiktage Mondsee, near Salzburg, and in 1999 he began a project to perform all the Mozart concertos in Salzburg at the Mozartwoche of the Mozarteum Foundation, creating his own ensemble for the project. In addition to the complete Mozart sonatas, his recordings include all the Mozart piano concertos (with the Camerata Academica of the Salzburg Mozarteum directed by Sándor Végh), the complete Beethoven concertos, all the Schubert solo sonatas, Schubert and Beethoven lieder with Peter Schreier, an outstanding two-disc set of Haydn sonatas, Smetana polkas, Bach solo works and concertos and the three Bartók concertos. Schiff has also recorded a fine collection of solo and concerted works by Janáček, made during his festival programmes at Mondsee, and a recital of Beethoven on the composer's own Broadwood of 1817.

Schiff, David (b Bronz, NY, 30 Aug 1945). American composer and writer. Although he composed a great deal as a child, he studied English at Columbia University. After he became involved in the new-music movement there and at Cambridge University during the 1960s, he began postgraduate studies in composition at the Juilliard School (DMA 1979); his teachers included Roger Smalley, John Corigliano, Ursula Mamlok and Elliott Carter. He has won a League-ISCM Composers prize, an NEA fellowship, a commission from Chamber Music Northwest and an Opera America grant. Perhaps his most successful work has been the opera Gimpel the Fool, with a Yiddish libretto by Isaac Bashevis Singer. First composed as an hour-long vaudeville with piano accompaniment (1975–6), the work was soon expanded for a small orchestra suggestive of a klezmer band (1979–80). Gimpel is eclectic and written with a shrewd grasp of language and theatre; it also draws upon the kaleidescopic variety of the Jewish musical heritage. In Schiff's Elegy for string quartet, the viola assumes a prominence that makes the work concerto-like, while each instrument takes on an emotional quality of its own, suggesting the influence of Carter. A provocative music critic and cultural commentator, Schiff has written for the New York Times and Atlantic Monthly. He is also the author of the first full-length study of Carter's music, The Music of Elliott Carter (London, 1983, rev. 2/1998), and of Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue (Cambridge, 1997).

CAROL J. OJA

Schiff, Heinrich (b Gmunden, 18 Nov 1951). Austrian cellist and conductor. The son of two composers, he began playing the piano at six and the cello at ten. He studied with Tobias Kühne at the Vienna Hochschule für Musik and André Navarra in Detmold and made his Vienna and London débuts in 1973, the latter with the first British performance of Lutosławski's Cello Concerto, conducted by the composer. Schiff is a powerful yet refined player whose playing of unaccompanied Bach – on a cello with modern set-up – has attracted much praise, many critics finding it a valid compromise between period instrument and modern styles. He has all the major cello concertos at his command and has introduced works by Henze, Richard Rodney Bennett, Helmut Eder, Wilhelm Killmayer, Christoph Casken and Günther Bialas. In chamber music he has collaborated with the Alban Berg and Hagen Quartets and such colleagues as Christian Zacharias, Ton Koopman and Frank Peter Zimmermann. He has recorded much of the cello repertory including the Vieuxtemps, Lutosławski and Shostakovich concertos and Prokofiev's Sinfonia concertante. He plays a 1698 Stradivari. Schiff made his conducting début with the Vienna SO in 1984 and since 1990, when the Northern Sinfonia appointed him artistic director, he has split his time between playing and conducting. In 1990–92 he was guest conductor of the Deutsche Kammerphilharmonie and in 1995 he was appointed chief conductor of the Winterthur Musikkollegium and the Copenhagen PO. He has also conducted a number of opera productions.

Schifrin, Lalo (Boris) (b Buenos Aires, 21 June 1932). American composer and jazz pianist of Argentine birth. He studied piano as a child with Andreas Karalis and later took harmony lessons from Juan Carlos Paz. He won a scholarship to the Paris Conservatoire, where he was supervised by Charles Koechlin and studied with Olivier Messiaen. While in Paris he played with local jazz artists and in 1955 represented Argentina in the third International Jazz Festival. On his return home he established himself as a composer, arranger, conductor and pianist who was equally at ease in popular, jazz and art-music circles. He formed the first Argentine big band in the Basie-Gillespie tradition and earned awards for both film and concert music. Schifrin moved to New York in 1958, where he gained recognition as the pianist in Gillespie's jazz quintet (1960–62); he also recorded with other well-known jazz artists. From 1962 to the early 1980s he concentrated on composition: his Jazz Suite on the Mass Texts (1965) is highly regarded, and he became a major composer for films. His work for television has included the themes to the series 'The Man from UNCLE' and 'Mission: Impossible'. Shifrin's works often involve a successful synthesis of elements of both jazz and contemporary art-music, including serialism, aleatory devices and electronics.

In film, the latin jazz of his early scores, as in Sol Madrid (1968), gradually incorporated funk elements for films such as Bullitt (1968) and Dirty Harry (1971), later drawing on disco for Rollercoaster (1979). He taught composition at UCLA (1968–71), but from the 1980s onwards Schifrin has also concentrated on conducting (for example with the "Three Tenors'– Carreras, Domingo and Pavarotti) and arranging.

MICHAEL J. BUDDS/R

Schikaneder [Schickaneder]. Austrian family of German origin.

(1) Urban Schikaneder (b Regensburg, 2 Nov 1746; d Vienna, 11 April 1818). Actor and singer. As 'Hr. Schikaneder der Ältere' he sang First Priest in the première of Die Zauberflöte in 1791. For some years either side of this event he was a member of the theatrical company of his brother (2) Emanuel Schikaneder, and during its years of travel he also took a share in the administrative responsibilities.

(2) Emanuel (Johann Joseph [Baptist]) Schikaneder (b Straubing, 1 Sept 1751; d Vienna, 21 Sept 1812). Dramatist, theatre director, actor, singer and composer. Educated at the Jesuit Gymnasium at Regensburg, where he was a cathedral chorister, Schikaneder may briefly have been a town musician before he became an actor with F.J. Moser's troupe in 1773 or 1774. In 1774 he danced in a court ballet at Innsbruck, where his Singspiel Die Lyranten (of which he wrote both words and music) was performed in 1775 or 1776. The Innsbruck company, then under Andreas Schopf and Theresia Schimann, moved in 1776 to Augsburg, where on 9 February 1777 he married Maria Magdalena (known as Eleonore) Arth (b Hermannstadt, 1751; d Vienna, 22 June 1821), an actress in the company. In 1777–8 they were in Nuremberg with Moser's company, and in December 1777 Schikaneder made a famous guest appearance as Hamlet at the Munich court theatre, where he was obliged to repeat the final scene as an encore. From January 1778 he was director of the troupe, appearing at Ulm, Stuttgart, Augsburg, Nuremberg, Rothenburg and elsewhere. In 1780 they went to Laibach (now Ljubljana), Klagenfurt and Linz before beginning a lengthy season at Salzburg in September, during which Schikaneder became friendly with the Mozarts. Further travels through Austria included summer seasons at Graz in 1781 and 1782, the winter of 1782–3 in Pressburg (now Bratislava), and a guest appearance in summer 1783 at the Kärntnertortheater, Vienna.

After further visits to Pest and Pressburg, where Joseph II saw him perform in October 1784, Schikaneder was invited to play in Vienna. He and Hubert Kumpf began a three-month season of operas and Singspiele at the Kärntnertor on 5 November. Thereafter, Schikaneder was a member of the Nationaltheater, performing in plays and operas, from 1 April 1785 until 28 February 1786. During this time his own troupe was run by his wife and Johann Friedel, touring in southern Austria until it moved into the Freihaus-Theater auf der Wieden, Vienna, in November 1788. Schikaneder himself, in February 1786, had been granted an imperial licence for the building of a suburban theatre but did not make use of it for 15 years, forming instead a new company specializing in Singspiele and operas, which he took to Salzburg, Augsburg and Memmingen. In February 1787 he took over the Prince of Thurn and Taxis's court theatre at Regensburg. When Johann Friedel died at the end of March 1789, Schikaneder and his wife took over the Freihaus-Theater, bringing from Regensburg the singer-composers Schack and Gerl. Schikaneder's reign at the Freihaus began on 12 July 1789 with the first performance of his 'Anton' opera Der dumme Gärtner, and from this time dates the beginning of his steady series of plays, opera and Singspiel librettos which were the backbone of the repertory of his theatre (but which were also performed in other theatres, sometimes with new musical scores).

Schikaneder's years of travel had seen the production of more straight plays than operas; in Vienna he placed the emphasis firmly on opera, and commissioned settings of his own texts from Mozart (Die Zauberflöte), Süssmayr (Der Spiegel von Arkadien), Wölfl (Der Höllenberg), Mederitsch and Winter (one act each of Babylons Pyramiden; Winter also set Das Labyrinth, a sequel to Die Zauberflöte). He also received scores from his theatre Kapellmeister, Henneberg (Die Waldmänner), Haibel (Der Tiroler Wastel) and Seyfried (Der Löwenbrunn and Der Wundermann am Rheinfall). As the 1790s advanced, Schikaneder began to suffer from increasing financial difficulties as he strove to surpass the achievements of his rivals and of his own greatest successes. In 1799 he handed over the management of the theatre to Bartholomäus Zitterbarth while continuing his artistic direction. Of the 12 greatest successes at the Freihaus, which closed on 12 June 1801, eight – including the first five – were written by Schikaneder himself.

On 13 June 1801 Schikaneder opened the new Theater an der Wien, using the licence he had previously been granted; it was the most lavishly equipped and one of the largest theatres of its age, and has continued in almost unbroken use. It opened with Teyber's setting of Schikaneder's libretto Alexander, but a change in public taste and a decline in Schikaneder's standards and powers of judgment were influential in the decision to sell the licence to Zitterbarth after less than a year. Schikaneder continued to supply plays and librettos, and to act, but despite two further periods as artistic director his fortunes were waning. After the sale of the theatre in 1806 Schikaneder left Vienna and took over the Brno Theatre. At Easter 1809 he was back in Vienna, but financial ruin and failing mental health darkened his last years. On his way to Budapest to take up an appointment as director of a new German theatre company in 1812 he became mad, returned to Vienna, and died in penury shortly after; a performance of his play Die Schweden vor Brünn was given for his benefit at the Theater in der Leopoldstadt on 18 July 1812 – an uncommon tribute from a rival theatre, albeit one that had successfully staged his plays since the early 1780s and would continue to do so until the 1850s.

Schikaneder was one of the most talented and influential theatre men of his age. Although it is fashionable to decry his plays (of which there are nearly 50) and librettos, they more than satisfied the demands of their day. Goethe praised his skill at creating strong dramatic situations, and, though the verse is often trite, the libretto of Die Zauberflöte (Gieseke's claims to the authorship of which were proved false by Komorzynski and more scientifically by Rommel) is by no means unworthy of Mozart's music. Some of Schikaneder's comedies (the 'Anton' plays, Der Tiroler Wastel, Das abgebrannte Haus, Der Fleischhauer von Ödenburg, Die Fiaker in Wien) continued to be much performed for many years and strongly influenced the later development of the Viennese Lokalstück('local play'). Early in his career Schikaneder composed two, and perhaps several more, theatre scores: it has long been known that the music as well as the text of Die Lyranten was his work; and for the production of his Singspiel Das Urianische Schloss (1786, Salzburg) at the Theater in der Leopoldstadt in November 1787, a score by him is specifically mentioned by Wenzel Müller in his diary ('Opera by Em: Schikaneder, music, and book').

(3) Anna [Nanny, Nanette] Schikaneder (b 1767; d Regensburg, 1862). Singer, daughter of (1) Urban Schikaneder. She sang First Boy in the première of Die Zauberflöte and was later a member of the Theater in der Leopoldstadt, singing the Queen of Night in that company's first performance of the opera in July 1811. After her retirement she lived for many years at Freising, completely blind.

(4) Karl Schikaneder (b Freising, 1770; d Prague, 25 March 1845). German composer, dramatist, actor, singer and director, son of (1) Urban Schikaneder. After a period with the Freihaus-Theater company of his uncle (2) Emanuel Schikaneder, he became a director (Regisseur) at the Theater in der Josefstadt in 1803. He moved to Steyr, Karlsbad and Brno (where he was a member of the company his uncle directed in 1807). In 1811, and again from 1816 to 1819, he was a member of the Theater in der Leopoldstadt, being employed as dramatist, singer and actor. He moved to Prague in 1819, where he was appointed opera director, retiring in 1834. He was the author of a once-popular series of plays and composed a number of musical scores, including at least six to his own texts (others of which were set by Wenzel Müller, Franz Teyber and Franz Volkert (i)).

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Schikardt [Schikhart], Johann Christian. See SCHICKHARDT, JOHANN CHRISTIAN.

Schildt, Melchior (b Hanover, 1592–3; d Hanover, 18 May 1667). German composer and organist. He came from a Hanover family, four of whom (his grandfather Gerdt, his father Antonius and his brother Ludolph, as well as himself) were employed over a period of more than 125 years as organists at the three churches in the Old Town of Hanover. After initially being taught music at Hanover by his father and Andreas Crappius, he went in December 1609 to Amsterdam to study with Sweelinck, with whom he remained probably until the end of 1612. No documents have survived relating to his activities over the next ten years, but from 1623 to 1626 he was organist at the Marienkirche in Wolfenbüttel, and from 1626 to 1629 he was court organist to King Christian IV in Copenhagen. After his father's death in 1629, he succeeded him as organist of the Marktkirche, Hanover, and held this post until his death.

Of the north German organists of Schütz's generation, the pupils of Sweelinck who founded the so-called north German organ school in the first half of the 17th century, Schildt, together with Scheidemann and Jacob Praetorius (ii), is one of those whose extant works mark them out as composers with distinctive personalities. Except for a single vocal work, all of his surviving music is for keyboard, and as with Sweelinck's other pupils, most of it consists of chorale-based organ works. Of his pieces in this genre, the five-verse cycle Herr Christ, der einig Gotts Sohn is stylistically still quite close to Sweelinck, but in the Magnificat 1. toni, his most distinguished and important organ work, which is also in five separate sections, the modern north German forms of chorale fantasia and ricercare are clearly visible. This work was probably one of a now lost series of Magnificat settings by Schildt comparable with the cycles of Scheidt, Praetorius and Scheidemann. Of his other keyboard works, the Pavana Lachrymae is specially fine. It is one of many keyboard arrangements by English and continental composers of the first piece in Dowland's Lachrymae (1604), and is notable for its particularly expressive colouring. Schildt's one extant vocal work is the chorale concerto Ach mein herzliebes Jesulein. It is a masterly example of the sacred concerto for voices and instruments. As such it is indebted to Schütz's Symphoniae sacrae, but the way in which Schildt applied this style to the treatment of a chorale in order to provide a subjective interpretation of the content and emotional impact of the chorale text was without precedent. The quality and originality of this piece make the loss of a further nine vocal works by him, known only by their titles, particularly regrettable.

WERNER BREIG (with PIETER DIRKSEN)

Schilke, Renold O(tto) (b Green Bay, WI, 30 June 1910; d Sun City, AZ, 5 Sept 1982). American trumpet and mouthpiece manufacturer. He began to study the cornet under Del Wright in 1918; his later teachers were Max Schlossberg, Georges Mager, Edward Llewellyn and Herbert Clarke. He started playing professionally with the Orpheum Vaudeville Circuit in 1921; he also worked at the Holton factory in Elkhorn, Wisconsin (1921–2). In 1929 he moved to Chicago, beginning an association with the Chicago SO, first as substitute, then as assistant first trumpet (from 1934), first trumpet (in 1939), and substitute again (from 1940 to 1961). He began to experiment with trumpet making in the 1920s, and helped Elden Benge from 1934 to 1952 (for discussion, see BACH, VINCENT). In 1947 he began to specialize in high-quality professional instruments (for illustration, see TRUMPET (ii), fig.18); his business was incorporated as Schilke Music Products in 1956. One result of Schilke's considerable acoustical research, in which V.-C. Mahillon was his most important guide, was the introduction in 1968 of the tuning-bell, through which the mouthpipe tuning-slide was abolished; the first prototype of this device was made in 1928. By the early 1970s the company, which had remained in Chicago, had reached the size it would remain for the rest of the century, with about 35 employees, all of them musicians, producing about 60 models of trumpet and cornet; from 1975 to 1980 horns were also made. Schilke was a consultant for Yamaha from 1966 until his death. In 1996 the president of the firm was Schilke's son, Renold E. Schilke (b Chicago, 24 Aug 1941).

EDWARD H. TARR

Schiller, (Johann Christoph) Friedrich von (b Marbach, 10 Nov 1759; d Weimar, 9 May 1805). German dramatist, poet, aesthetician and historian. The son of an army officer, he had an unsettled childhood and youth. During his years as a student (of law, then medicine) at the Karlsschule in Stuttgart (1773–80) he wrote his first play, Die Räuber. Shortly after its première, in Mannheim in 1782, he was obliged to flee from Stuttgart and settled in Mannheim, where he wrote Fiesco and Kabale und Liebe. In 1785, encouraged by C.G. Körner, he moved to Leipzig and Dresden where, between 1785 and 1787, he completed Don Carlos and considered writing a libretto for Naumann. In 1787 he went to Weimar, where he was to settle in 1799; in 1789 he became professor of history at Jena.

Schiller married Charlotte von Lengefeld, a keen amateur pianist, in 1790, and about this time he became acquainted with Rochlitz and Reichardt. From 1794 Schiller was on very friendly terms with Goethe, developing with him the most famous artistic collaboration in the history of German letters. Apart from their joint ventures Schiller's Weimar years saw the completion and production of the Wallenstein trilogy (1798–9), Maria Stuart (1800), Die Jungfrau von Orleans (1801), Die Braut von Messina (1803) and Wilhelm Tell (1804). The unfinished Demetrius also dates from this period. The theme of these dramas is to a more or less marked extent the search for moral freedom, though political freedom is as much the subject of Wilhelm Tell as it had been of the early revolutionary plays.

Schiller was no musician, and indeed there is little evidence that he understood or appreciated music to any great extent. His tastes were conservative; Gluck alone among his great contemporaries found a ready appreciation from him. However, he stated that 'a certain musical state of mind [Gemütsstimmung]' was for him the precursor of poetic inspiration. Much of Schiller's verse has a kind of musicality, as well as rhythmic élan – qualities found in his lyrics and ballads as well as in the great dramatic dialogues and monologues. Incidental music plays a modest part in most of Schiller's plays; in one, Die Braut von Messina, he strove to recreate the mood and conditions of Greek classical tragedy, with an important role for the chorus.

About 1800 Goethe and Schiller were concerned to effect a closer alliance between music and drama. Schiller justified his use of the chorus in Die Braut von Messina in the essay 'Über den Gebrauch des Chors in der Tragödie', with which he prefaced the play, stating that the chorus acted not only as a commentator but also as a 'living wall', distancing the spectators from the action and pointing up the idealistic and universal nature of art. His intention to accompany the choric interludes instrumentally was dropped on the advice of Körner. Schiller's views on music are scattered among his letters and aesthetic essays. In 'Über das Pathetische' (1793) he argued that the primary concern of tragic art is the depiction of suffering and moral resistance to it. His deep mistrust of the emotional, even sensual effect of music is clear, music for Schiller even at its most intellectual having 'a closer affinity to the senses by nature of its material than true aesthetic freedom allows'.

A summary of his views on the relationship between music and the other arts may be found in Letter 22 of his 'Über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen' (1795):

Music in its highest perfection must become form [Gestalt] and make its effect on us with the calm power of the antique world; fine art in its highest perfection must become music and touch us through its direct sensuous presence; poetry, in its most perfect form must, like music, seize us powerfully, but at the same time, like the plastic arts, surround us with calm clarity.

Apart from the operas that Rossini and Verdi based on Schiller plays there are numerous other, largely forgotten settings. Mercadante as well as Verdi set Die Räuber; Lalo wrote an (unperformed) Fiesque (1866–8); Verdi's Luisa Miller was preceded by a once popular Viennese musical parody of Schiller's Kabale und Liebe, by Bäuerle and Drechsler; Michael Costa wrote a Don Carlos (1844). Not surprisingly, Schiller's grandest achievement, the Wallenstein trilogy, has tempted numerous composers to try their hand with incidental music and tone poems, but there have also been several operatic settings. Maria Stuart gave birth to several operas, but even more numerous are the settings based on Die Jungfrau von Orleans, from a very varied list of composers besides Tchaikovsky and Verdi.

Many composers have based operas on Schiller's adaptation of Gozzi's Turandot; an Italian translation of Schiller's Turandot, itself a reworked translation of Gozzi, was the starting-point for Puccini's opera. Die Braut von Messina has inspired one particularly distinguished setting, Fibich's Nevĕsta mesinská. Schiller's last completed drama, Wilhelm Tell, ineradicably associated with Rossini, also spawned Henry Bishop's adaptation Hofer, the Tell of the Tyrol (1830).

PETER BRANSCOMBE

Schilling, Bertha Agnes Lisette. See BRÉVAL, LUCIENNE.

Schilling, Gustav (b Schwiegershausen, 3 Nov 1805; d Crete, Nebraska, March 1880). German writer on music. Like others of his generation, Schilling, the son of a pastor, received his education in both music and theology, in the former partly from his father, in the latter from teachers at Göttingen and Halle. From 1830 to 1836 he was director of a music school in Stuttgart founded by Franz Stöpel, but gave it up to become a freelance writer in theology and politics as well as in music. He was founder and secretary of the Deutsche National-Verein für Musik und ihre Wissenschaft and edited its yearbook from 1839 to 1843.

Between 1839 and 1850 Schilling published over a score of books on musical subjects including aesthetics, harmony, pianism and composers (among these an account of Liszt, 1842), which are generally superficial; they are, however, significant in their development of both performance theory and the history of music theory. His career in Germany came to an end in 1857 when he was prosecuted for debt and fled to America. His plan to found a new conservatory in New York came to nothing, and after spending some further time in that city, he moved to Montreal and thence to Crete in Nebraska, where he died on his son's farm.

Schilling is remembered today only for his six-volume Encyclopädie der gesammten musikalischen Wissenschaften oder Universal Lexikon der Tonkunst. The contributors included A.B. Marx, Rellstab, Schnyder von Wartensee, Seyfried, G.W. Fink, J.A.G. Heinroth and Gottfried Weber. Schilling seems to have written many unsigned articles, including perhaps the one on himself. The subject articles are of much less interest than those on musicians, especially secondary names of roughly the editor's own time: the latter often contain information which cannot be found elsewhere.

ALEC HYATT KING/MALCOLM MILLER

Schilling, Hans Ludwig (b Mayen, Rhineland, 9 March 1927). German composer. In 1947 he entered the Staatliche Hochschule für Musik, Freiburg, and later studied at the universities of Zürich (1951–2) and Freiburg (1953–5). During these years his teachers included Genzmer, Uetel and Hindemith (composition) and Gurlitt and Zenck (musicology). From 1954 to 1959 he taught at Freiburg University and in 1960 was visiting professor at the Staatliche Hochschule für Musik, Karlsruhe. He returned to Freiburg in 1962 to teach at the Pädagogische Hochschule and, concurrently, at the Hohe Fachschule für Sozialarbeit. Schilling has also been active as a writer on music and was for 15 years reviewer for the Badische Zeitung of Freiburg. His early compositions stand within the Brahms-Reger tradition, although the occasional use of modal structures, isorhythm and canon reveals his interest in medieval music. His first dodecaphonic works, written in the early 1950s, retain a harmonic relationship with Hindemith; later, as his employment of serial technique became more strict, the influence of Dallapiccola became evident. Schilling's most individual works were written after 1960, and they show a variety of means of juxtaposing musical materials. Jazz elements, quodlibet technique and instrumental contrast are all characteristic of his later style.

GEORGE W. LOOMIS

Schillinger, Joseph (Moiseyevich) [Lynn, Frank] (b Kharkiv, 31 Aug 1895; d New York, 23 March 1943). Russian theorist and composer, naturalized American. He studied composition and conducting at the St Petersburg Conservatory (1914–18), where his teachers included Nikolay Tcherepnin, and also trained in mathematics. After the completion of his studies, he began a successful career in Kharkiv, Moscow and Leningrad (now St Petersburg) as a teacher, administrator and conductor. He conducted the Ukrainian SO (1920–21), served as composer for the State Academic Theatre (1925–8) and with Leopold Teplitsky organized the first jazz band concert held in Russia (1927). Most of his compositions were written during these years. In 1928 he emigrated to the USA and settled in New York, where he taught music, mathematics, art history and his own rhythmic theories at the New School for Social Research, New York University and Columbia University Teachers College. He became an American citizen in 1936.

During the 1920s and 30s Schillinger developed a system of musical composition that reduced melody, harmony and especially rhythm to geometric phase relationships. Every conceivable permutation of these relationships was 'scientifically' catalogued in his theoretical writings. He extended his ideas to include issues of orchestration and the emotional and semantic aspects of music, as well as applying them to dramatic theatre, graphic design, motion pictures and other kinetic art forms. His experiments with complex rhythms were realized on the 'rhythmicon', an electronic device constructed by Lev Termen to specifications of Henry Cowell. The Schillinger System became the basis of the course of study used for Schillinger's private pupils, many of whom were composers and arrangers of commercial and film music. His best-known students included Tommy Dorsey, Vernon Duke, George Gershwin, Benny Goodman, Oscar Levant, Eubie Blake, John Lewis, Gerry Mulligan, Carmine Coppola, and Glenn Miller. Schillinger's music, apart from some classroom exercises and examples in his theoretical writings, shows no clear connections to his pedagogical system. His style is generally conservative and reflects an eclectic Russian influence. A number of songs are written under the pseudonym Frank Lynn.

JAMES M. BURK/WAYNE J. SCHNEIDER

Schillings, Max von (b Düren, 19 April 1868; d Berlin, 24 July 1933). German composer, conductor and opera administrator. He learnt the violin, piano and theory in Bonn, before attending the University of Munich, where he studied law, philosophy, literature and art history. There he began a lifelong friendship with Richard Strauss who encouraged him to devote his energies towards a musical career. In 1892 he was appointed assistant stage conductor at Bayreuth, becoming chorus master there ten years later. Gradually he came to be recognized as one of the leading musical figures in Munich, working as composer, conductor and teacher. His reputation was sealed in 1903 when he was appointed Königlicher Professor at Munich, where his pupils included Furtwängler and Heger. In 1908 he became assistant to the Intendant of the Hoftheater in Stuttgart, remaining there for the next ten years. His tenure was marked by several notable performances, including the première of the first version of Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos (1912) with the composer conducting and Schillings's own adaptation of Berlioz's Les Troyens (1913). He also arranged recitatives for Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail (1910).

Although Schillings's earliest efforts at composition were concentrated towards songs, chamber and orchestral music, opera remained his major preoccupation. This first opera was Ingwelde, a music drama based on a poem by Count Ferdinand von Sporck, which recounts the Scandinavian Svarfdälasaga in Zedlitz's Altnordische Bilder. First performed in Karlsruhe in 1894 under Felix Mottl, initially it was greeted with critical approval and received further performances under Strauss in Munich in 1897. But like countless other operas of the period, including Strauss's Guntram, Ingwelde suffered from a poor text and an obvious imitation of Wagner's style, particularly that of the Ring. Not only was the plot closely related to Nibelungen sagas, but the heroine's characterization bore a strong resemblance to Brünnhilde.

In Der Pfeifertag, first produced at Schwerin in 1899, Schillings attempted to write a comedy in the manner of Die Meistersinger. Unlike Wagner, however, Schillings betrays little feeling for dramatic action and the leitmotifs are less distinctive and less well developed. The opera's best sections are lyrical and include an effective symphonic intermezzo.

Schillings's third opera, Moloch, constituted yet another response to Wagnerian music drama and is closely modelled on Parsifal. Here Gerhäuser's scenario concerns the Moloch priest Hiram who inflames the Northern Land of Thule with a new faith that threatens the country's stability. The elderly king remains loyal to the old beliefs, while his son becomes dependent upon these new idols and pays for such treachery with his life. In many respects Moloch, first performed in Dresden in 1906 under Ernst von Schuch, reflects the composer's attitude towards contemporary musical developments in his own country. The new gods, in effect, are representative of Schillings's fear that foreign elements were affecting the purity of German music.

This evident conservatism was masked by his activities in Stuttgart where he conducted such operas as Strauss's Salome and Elektra. Indeed, these works, as well as the increasing popularity in Germany of Italian verismo, exercised a considerable impact upon the composer's final and most successful opera, Mona Lisa. Completed in four and a half weeks during 1915, this work exemplified a deliberate attempt to exploit sensationalism in the theatre. The story centres around Mona Lisa's enigmatic smile which arouses the suspicions of her pearl-dealer husband Francesco del Giaconda. He lures her lover into his gem cupboard, thereby suffocating him, but Mona Lisa takes her revenge by locking her husband in the cupboard to share her lover's fate. As the story is somewhat insubstantial, the action is framed by a prologue and epilogue in which the three characters are identified with a modern honeymoon couple and their lay-brother tourist guide. Of all Schillings's operas, Mona Lisa enjoyed the greatest longevity on the stage and became a notable vehicle for his second wife Barbara Kemp, as well as Maria Jeritza. The score is a typical late-Romantic effusion which perhaps lacks thematic distinction, but demonstrates considerable expertise in theatrical effects.

Schillings also achieved success with the earlier melodrama Das Hexenlied (1904) which constitutes one of the most imaginative examples of this problematic genre. Arguably his finest orchestral compositions are the two Symphonische Phantasien of 1895, both of which demonstrate a formidable command of the medium and a powerful sense of drama; these qualities were recognized by Strauss who proved to be a loyal advocate of the composer. Of the songs, the Glockenlieder (1908) effect an almost Mahlerian sensitivity in places, though their appeal is undermined by the rather banal nature of Spitteler's poetry.

After 1915 Schillings's creativity waned considerably. To a certain extent this crisis was caused by personal difficulties with his first wife and disputes with his employers. In 1918 he resigned from Stuttgart and in the following year was appointed Intendant at the Berlin Staatsoper, a post he retained until 1925. He became increasingly disillusioned with the artistic climate of the Weimar Republic, particularly after his application to become Director of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik was rejected. As an administrator, however, he made strenuous efforts to conceal his nationalist sympathies, presenting a balanced repertory at the Staatsoper which included such works as Pfitzner's Palestrina, Schreker's Die Gezeichneten, Strauss's Die Frau ohne Schatten and Busoni's Turandot and Arlecchino. In 1925 he clashed with Carl Becker, the Prussian Minister of Culture, over artistic policy and was dismissed from his post. This action provoked a scandal which united even those who were opposed to Schillings's attitudes.

Schillings spent the next few years touring Europe and America as conductor of a travelling German opera ensemble. He also conducted at the Zoppot (now Sopot) Waldoper (until 1932) and became Generalmusikdirektor in Riga. In 1929 he returned to the Berlin Staatsoper to conduct Strauss and Wagner and even contemplated writing another opera. Yet his influence upon German musical life was essentially marginal until the Nazis gained more prominence. In 1931 Der Pfeifertag enjoyed a revival and in the following year Schillings was appointed to several prestigious positions including that of President of the Prussian Academy of Arts. He proved a willing instrument in purging this institution of 'alien' influences and in March 1933 was rewarded with the position of Intendant at the Berlin Städtische Oper. Although Schillings's death in July 1933 prevented him from involvement in developing artistic policy during the Third Reich, his early operas re-emerged over the next few years, with Ingwelde produced at the Berlin Staatsoper in 1938. Inevitably a reaction against his music set in after World War II, but his work underwent partial rehabilitation, especially after the revival of Mona Lisa in Karlsruhe in 1984, and the release of several recordings during the 1990s.

ERIK LEVI

Schilson, Baron János (b c1750; d after 1809). Hungarian statesman and composer. On 13 December 1777 his drama in five acts Die Wilde, with music by Anton Zimmermann, was performed in Pozsony (now Bratislava). From 1782 to 1783 he was the royal commissar in Sopron. In 1791 he was commissioned to draw up the budget of the German theatre planned in Pest. He then lived in Surány for a time. His works written between 1800 and 1809 (including Hungarian and German dances, Hungarian, German, French and Italian songs and canons, a melodrama, a trio for flute, violin and bass, sacred and secular choral works, and two pieces entitled Partita Turchese) are at the Széchényi National Library in Budapest. Outstanding in their melodic invention, they show the influence of both Viennese Classicism and the Hungarian verbunkos. His Egy hadi Tisztnek kedves Feleségétől butsúzó Éneke az Tsata előtt ('Farewell Song of an Officer Parting from his Beloved Wife before the Battle') for voice, two violins, two oboes, two horns and double bass is one of the earliest examples of the Hungarian orchestral song.

Schimbracki, Johannes. See ŠIMBRACKÝ, JÁN.

Schimmel. German firm of piano makers. Established in 1885 in Leipzig, the firm moved to Brunswick in 1929 as part of a cooperative, becoming independent in 1931. Destroyed by bombing in 1944, the factory was again producing pianos by 1948. Thereafter production expanded vigorously, reaching a peak of approximately 9000 instruments a year about 1980. Having begun to cooperate with French makers in 1971, Schimmel took over the most well-known French names after 1974 and by the end of the 20th century was marketing pianos under the Erard, Gaveau and Pleyel labels. Production had then slowed to about 4000–5000 instruments annually. Schimmel has taken a lead in manufacturing redesigned cases in unusual shapes with modern materials.

CYRIL EHRLICH/EDWIN M. GOOD

Schimon, Adolf (b Vienna, 29 Feb 1820; d Leipzig, 21 June 1887). Austrian composer, pianist and singing teacher. The son of a painter well known for his portraits of Beethoven, Weber and Spohr, he entered the Paris Conservatoire at the age of 16, studying the piano, composition (with Berton and Halévy) and singing (with Bordogni and Banderali). In the 1840s he travelled to Italy for further study in singing and in 1846 his opera Alessandro Stradella was produced in Florence. From 1850 to 1853 he was in London, acting as maestro al cembalo at Her Majesty's Theatre, as well as touring with Balfe, Sims Reeves and Clara Novello. While doing similar work at the Théâtre Italien Opera in Paris (1854–9), his comedy List um List was produced in Schwerin in 1858 under Flotow and became popular in several theatres in north Germany. He taught singing at the Leipzig Conservatory from 1874 to 1877, and then in Munich until 1886, later returning to Leipzig. As a singing teacher he had a considerable reputation and was also well known as an accompanist. He wrote chamber music, piano music and songs, and made editions of vocal works by A. Scarlatti, Porpora and Paradisi and of other Italian music.

Schimon's wife, Anna Regan (b Aich, 18 Sept 1841; d Munich, 18 April 1902), whom he married in Florence in 1872, was a singer of some distinction. She studied in Dresden and then worked under her aunt Karoline Unger in Florence. She made her début in Siena and went on to sing at the court theatre in Hanover. As court singer to the Grand Duchess Helena Pavlovna, she sang in St Petersburg under Berlioz; she also appeared in London, being especially successful in performances of lieder. She toured widely until her marriage, when she appeared less frequently; after Schimon's death she taught in Munich.

Schindelmeisser, Louis (Alexander Balthasar) (b Königsberg, 8 Dec 1811; d Darmstadt, 30 March 1864). German conductor, composer and clarinettist. He studied in Berlin with Gährich and Marx, and continued in Leipzig with his stepbrother Heinrich Dorn (1831), later Hofkapellmeister in Berlin and an opponent of Wagner. Schindelmeisser became a friend of Wagner in Leipzig, and in 1832 was named Kapellmeister of the theatre in Salzburg. He then occupied similar posts in Innsbruck, Graz and at the Königstädtisches Theater, Berlin (1837). In 1838 he went to the German theatre in Pest, and from 1847 worked successively in Hamburg, Frankfurt and Wiesbaden. From 1853 until his death he was Hofkapellmeister in Darmstadt. He was also a virtuoso clarinettist, who gave many performances, particularly in the 1830s.

Schindelmeisser was one of the early admirers and enthusiastic partisans of Wagner. It was probably on his recommendation that Wagner was appointed musical director in Rīga in 1837. In 1852–3 he arranged for the first performances in Wiesbaden and Darmstadt of Tannhäuser, and the first in Darmstadt of Rienzi and Lohengrin (the last having been given only in Weimar, by Liszt). There is, however, hardly a trace of Wagner's influence in Schindelmeisser's compositions, but it can perhaps be detected in the use of chromaticism in his last opera, Melusine (1861). His operas are, rather, in the style of the older Romantic operatic tradition of Weber and Spohr. His other works, particularly his songs and character pieces for piano, show a particular liking for the intimacy of the smaller forms, and are often in a rather sentimental Biedermeier style.

Originally from Březnice, Johann Adam Schindler (fl 1723–33) and his younger brother Andreas (fl 1723–37) became members of the Dresden court orchestra in 1723, playing first and second horn respectively; they were succeeded by J.G. Knechtel and A.J. Hampel. The Schindlers sustained the remarkably high level of virtuosity that had been established by their predecessors Johann Adalbert Fischer (b Březnice, *c*1677; d after 1722) and Franz Adam Saam (b Arnstein, *c*1678; d ?Dresden, 1723). Dlabacž mentioned the Schindlers' praiseworthy playing at the performance of Fux's Costanza e Fortezza for the coronation of Charles VI at Prague in 1723. Though biographical information is scant, the Schindlers' abilities are attested by the demanding horn parts written during their tenures at Dresden; solo obbligatos in J.A. Hasse's opera Cleofide (1731) and in the 'Quoniam' of the Missa of Bach's B minor Mass (1733), as well as soloistic parts in ensemble concertos by J.F. Fasch, show that J.A. Schindler was a master of the highest register, capable of executing large dramatic leaps.

THOMAS HIEBERT

Schindler, Anton Felix (b Meedl, Moravia, 13 June 1795; d Bockenheim, nr Frankfurt, 16 Jan 1864). Moravian violinist, conductor, writer and biographer of Beethoven. The eldest of 12 children, he studied the violin with his father before becoming a choirboy at St Mauritz in Olmütz. Although music was his main interest, he moved to Vienna in 1813 to study law. He claimed that he first met Beethoven in March 1814, when Schuppanzigh asked him to deliver a note to the composer, and that later that year, his brief arrest for involvement in student protests aroused the interest of Beethoven, who then sought a closer acquaintance with him.

Despite his attempts to show otherwise, including forgeries in the conversation books, Schindler was not in close contact with Beethoven until 1820, and there are only scattered (authentic) earlier references to him in the conversation books. With the departure that year of Franz Oliva, Schindler became Beethoven's unpaid private secretary. By late 1822 he had abandoned his legal career to become Koncertmeister at the Theater in der Josefstadt. After the concert on 7 May 1824, at which the Ninth Symphony and parts of the Missa solemnis received their première, Beethoven accused Schindler (and others) of cheating him, an allegation that led to the longest rift in their relationship. With the onset of the composer's final illness in December 1826, Schindler again took over many of Beethoven's affairs, remaining in close contact with him until the end. Following Beethoven's death in March 1827, Schindler appropriated many items from his apartments, including the 400 or so conversation books, various manuscripts, sketchbooks and personal items, which he sold in 1845 to the Königliche Bibliothek in Berlin. He continued to pursue a musical career: in 1831 he became director of the Münster Musikverein, and from 1835 he directed music for the city of Aachen. His interest in the authentic performance of Beethoven's works, to which the biography bears witness, led to a series of articles in 1856 attacking Liszt and others.

For all its flaws, Schindler's greatest contribution remains his Beethoven biography. The first edition did not appear until 1840 despite Schindler's having sole access to much of the material. According to Tyson, the delay was due to a failed collaboration as well as the work's organization around three periods: Wegeler was originally to be responsible for the years 1770–1800, Stephan von Breuning for 1800–13 and Schindler for the rest. Other failed biographical collaborations and intrigues are chronicled in Tyson and Brenneis. An English translation by Ignaz Moscheles appeared in 1841. The 1842 essay 'Beethoven in Paris' relays French opinions of Beethoven from Schindler's 1841 trip to Paris, and was reprinted as an appendix to the second edition (1845) along with excerpts from the conversation books. The completely rewritten third edition (1860) retains a tripartite division, slightly altered, and expands the musical discussions, including references to the work of A.B. Marx, Ulïbïshev, Fétis and Lenz.

Schindler's biography greatly influenced the Romantic view of Beethoven. Some of his anecdotes – for example, Beethoven defying the Landrecht with the words 'My nobility is here and here' (pointing to his head and his heart) – though false, have coloured all subsequent views of the composer. Schindler's report of Beethoven's explanation for the opening of the Fifth Symphony ('thus Fate knocks at the door') and the supposed 'poetic' relationship between op.31 no.2 and Shakespeare's The Tempest are also unlikely to be true. Thayer discovered many inaccuracies in the biography, and his unease was justified: not only did Schindler destroy many conversation books, but Beck and Herre (1979) have shown conclusively that he later forged entries in the remaining ones. Schindler's value as an eyewitness, however problematic, remains uncontested, although any argument for which he is the sole corroborating primary source must be treated with caution.

K.M. KNITTEL

Schindler, Kurt (b Berlin, 17 Feb 1882; d New York, 16 Nov 1935). American composer and conductor of German birth. He attended the universities of Berlin and Munich (1899–1901), studying the piano with Ansorge and Gernsheim, composition and theory with Bussler, C. Taubmann and Thuille, and musicology with Stumpf and Friedlaender. Friedlaender's influence proved lasting, for he introduced Schindler to European folk music, particularly German. An equally important influence was Schindler's participation in a choral society under Gernsheim which performed modern arrangements of traditional songs.

Schindler made his official début as a composer at the Krefeld Music Festival in June 1902, although his songs had already been performed by such artists as Emmy Destinn, Ludwig Wüllner and E. Welt-Herzog. After successful conducting seasons at the Stuttgart Opera (1902) and the Staatstheater in Würzburg (1903), he was asked to assist Mottl and Strauss at the Berlin Opera (1904). In 1905 H. Conried invited him to New York to join the conducting staff at the Metropolitan Opera House. In 1909, at Mahler's suggestion, Schindler initiated the MacDowell Chorus, which, three years later, became the Schola Cantorum of New York. Under him, it established a reputation as one of the finest choral societies in North America; he resigned in 1926. A close friendship with Natalie Curtis prompted his continued interest in folk music, which became an important part of the choir's varied programmes, particularly in introducing Russian and Spanish folk music to American audiences. For his efforts in promoting Spanish music, he was invited to become a corresponding member of the Hispanic Society of America.

From 1907 Schindler served almost two decades as a reader, editor and critic for the publishers G. Schirmer; he also worked as an editor for Oliver Ditson. He was the musical director for Temple Emanu-El from 1912 to 1925. In autumn 1928 he went to Spain to undertake a systematic investigation of Spanish folk music. During three field trips (December 1929 to January 1933), he collected more than 1000 traditional melodies, a third on aluminium discs. In 1933 he was appointed the first chairman of music at the newly founded Bennington College, Vermont, but owing to the strenuous duties and his failing health he had to forgo his research. In 1941 the Hispanic Institute of Columbia University, which sponsored his third field trip, published his field transcriptions.

ISRAEL J. KATZ

Schindler, Poul Christian (b Copenhagen, 1648; d Copenhagen, 1740). Danish composer and instrumentalist. He studied the viola da gamba with A.G. Roberts at the court at Gottorf. After some years in the court orchestra he went to study composition at Dresden in September 1670. On his return in 1674 he became an instrumentalist at the court at Copenhagen and was also active as a composer. He is credited with being the composer of the first Danish opera, Der vereinigte Götterstreit, to a text (in German) by P.A. Burchardt. Written to celebrate King Christian V's birthday on 15 April 1689, it was receiving a second performance on 19 April when the opera house caught fire and burnt so rapidly that most of the audience (estimated at nearly 200), including Schindler's wife and daughter, were unable to escape. Nor did the music of the opera – like the rest of Schindler's output – survive, and no attempt was made to repeat the operatic experiment during the remainder of Christian V's reign. It was taken up again by Frederik IV, but his travels in Italy had given him a taste for Italian music, and Schindler was bypassed as a composer. By 1705 he had received no rise in salary for 30 years, and he complained to the king that the amount of composing expected of him had imposed a great strain and damaged his sight. He seems not to have succeeded, however, in improving his situation as a musician; instead, in 1707, he was relieved of some of his burden by being given a non-musical appointment while retaining half his musician's salary. He died at the age of 92, leaving a substantial collection of instruments and music.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Schinkel, Karl Friedrich (b Neuruppin, 13 March 1781; d Berlin, 9 Oct 1841). German architect, stage designer and painter. He moved to Berlin in 1794 and studied architecture under David and Friedrich Gilly, completing his studies in Italy and France (1803–5), where he developed his interest in painting. On returning to Berlin he started to work as a painter of panoramas and dioramas. Count Brühl, Intendant of the royal theatre in Berlin, made Schinkel chief designer (1815–28). As architect and assessor to the Prussian Ministry of Public

Interior of the Schauspielhaus on the Gendarmenmarkt, Berlin, designed by Karl Friedrich Schinkel, showing his set and backcloth for the inauguration ceremony, 1821: engraving from his 'Sammlung architektonischer Entwürfe', ii (Berlin, 1826)

Buildings from 1810, he also had a definitive influence on theatre construction.

Inspired by philosophical idealism and the pathos of the Wars of Liberation against Napoleon, Schinkel aimed at creating a kind of theatre that would educate and purify the public. This didactic end required that the same degree of participation should be experienced by each member of an audience. The stage should be visible from all points of the auditorium, which was not possible with the traditional proscenium arch and wings. He envisaged sets consisting of nothing more than a monumental view on a backcloth, like a panorama or diorama, thus reduced to the 'symbolic background' of the action, which would take place in the neutral proscenium area. The orchestra pit should be lowered for optical and acoustic reasons. As the architect of the Berlin Schauspielhaus (1817–21; see illustration), a royal theatre, Schinkel was unable to realize this 'democratic' ideal, but as a designer for the stage, he put it into practice in the historically accurate, formally perfect panoramic sets for Die Zauberflöte (1816) and more than 40 other operas, ballets and plays. His stage designs, first published in 1819, had an extraordinary influence on the style of operatic production that followed in Germany. His ideas for the reform of theatrical construction influenced Gottfried Semper and Wagner.

MANFRED BOETZKES

Schiøler, Victor (b Copenhagen, 7 April 1899; d Copenhagen, 17 Feb 1967). Danish pianist and conductor. He studied with his mother, giving his first piano recital in 1914, then with Ignacy Friedman in Copenhagen, and later with Artur Schnabel in Berlin. His first tour came in 1919 and in 1923 he began conducting. From 1930 to 1932 he directed opera and ballet at the Royal Theatre in Copenhagen, and in 1934 he resumed his career as a pianist. With the advent of the Nazis he withdrew from touring to study medicine, gaining a degree in psychiatry in 1940. In 1943 he escaped to Stockholm, where he practised medicine and gave concerts, but he returned to Copenhagen in 1945 and concentrated on music. Schiøler's pianism was influenced by Friedman and Schnabel: his recordings of late Beethoven sonatas and Brahms's Handel Variations have a deep structural emphasis. He often performed with the violinist Emil Telmányi, with whom he made an important recording of Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata.

ALLAN EVANS

Schiørring, Niels (b Sabro, 30 June ?1743; d Copenhagen, 6 Feb 1798). Danish harpsichordist, composer and music editor. He studied in Copenhagen with J.A. Scheibe and in Hamburg with C.P.E. Bach, whom he befriended. In 1773 he became a harpsichordist at the royal chapel and a teacher at the Hofteater's singing school. He replaced Giuseppe Sarti as chamber musician to the royal court in 1775. For Guldberg's new official psalter (1778) he edited a series of chorale books (1781–3) based on painstaking studies of early sources, to which, with C.P.E. Bach and the Danish musician Raehs as collaborators, he added outstanding harmonizations; these collections introduced monorhythmic chorale melodies (in minims) into Danish church song. Schiørring also edited collections of secular music (particularly popular songs from operas, plays and other works) and contributed to Gerber's Lexicon. (DBL, N. Schiørring)

NILS SCHIØRRING

Schiørring, Nils (b Copenhagen, 8 April 1910). Danish musicologist. He studied musicology with Abrahamsen and Larsen at the University of Copenhagen (MA 1933); at the same time he trained as a cellist under L. Jensen and was an orchestral player for several years. In 1950 Copenhagen University awarded him the doctorate for his fundamental study of Danish secular music in the 16th and 17th centuries. After working at the Copenhagen Music History Museum (1933–53) he was chairman of its board (1954–80); he was also music critic of the newspaper Nationaltidende (1939–49) and subsequently of the Berlingske tidende. He was editor of Dansk musiktidsskrift (1943–5) and Dansk aarbog for musikforskning (with Søren Sørensen, 1961–72). He began to teach at Copenhagen University in 1950 and in 1954 he was appointed professor of musicology, from which post he retired in 1980. He was also director of the folk music and ethnomusicological section of the Danish Folklore Collection (1953–71).

Schiørring's research has concentrated on Danish music and has covered all aspects of Danish musical life (nearly all the articles on Danish music and musicians in MGG1 are by him), but he has also considered music outside Denmark. An early interest in the French overture resulted in a monograph (1957) which demonstrated its relationship to the allemande, and his familiarity with 20th-century music is apparent in his survey Musikkens vejè (1959). His work on Danish popular music began in 1935 with his collaboration on the scholarly edition of the melodies for the great collection of Danish folksongs Danmarks gamle folkeviser (completed 1976); he published similar musical companions to H. Grüner-Nielsen's Danske viser and to the collected works of Kingo.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Schiøtz, Aksel (Hauch) (b Roskilde, 1 Sept 1906; d Copenhagen, 19 April 1975). Danish tenor. He studied in Copenhagen and with John Forsell. He made his stage début in 1939 at the Royal Opera, Copenhagen, as Mozart's Ferrando; the next year he sang the title role in Faust and Sverkel in J.P.E. Hartmann's Liden Kirsten. He refused to sing publicly during the German occupation, but gave recitals in secret for the Resistance workers. In 1946 he shared the role of Male Chorus with Peter Pears in the first performances of The Rape of Lucretia at Glyndebourne. In 1950 a brain tumour brought his career to an abrupt halt. With great fortitude, he learnt to speak and sing once more, and for a while resumed his career, but as a baritone. After retiring he taught in Minnesota, Toronto, Colorado and Copenhagen.

Schiøtz was among the foremost Mozart and lieder singers of the early postwar period as his recordings, particularly of Dichterliebe and Die schöne Müllerin, show. His tenor voice had a natural silvery quality and he used it with elegance and feeling. He wrote a book on singing, The Singer and his Art (New York, 1969).

ALAN BLYTH

Schipa, Tito [Raffaele Attilio Amadeo] (b Lecce, 2 Jan 1888; d New York, 16 Dec 1965). Italian tenor. He was the outstanding tenore di grazia of his generation. Having studied with A. Gerunda in Lecce and E. Piccoli in Milan, he made his début in 1910 in La traviata at Vercelli, and by the 1915–16 season had reached La Scala in Prince Igor and Manon. He soon began to specialize in the lighter and more lyrical roles, and became widely recognized as the successor of de Lucia, Bonci and Anselmi. In 1917 he was the first Ruggero in Puccini's La rondine at Monte Carlo. His beautiful, flexible voice was at its peak during his years in America: in Chicago from 1919 until 1932, and for the three following seasons (and during one later one, in 1941) at the Metropolitan. During the 1930s he sang regularly at La Scala, and in later years frequently in Rome, concentrating increasingly on a central repertory consisting of the lighter and more graceful Italian roles and on a smaller French group including the romantic heroes of Lakmé, Mignon, Manon and Werther.

Schipa's attractive voice, so well produced as to carry with ease in large theatres, was employed with exquisite skill and taste. His plangent tone, refined musical phrasing and clear enunciation, particularly well suited to moods of tenderness, melancholy and nostalgia, are displayed in his numerous recordings, which include a complete performance of Donizetti's Don Pasquale. He wrote an operetta, La Principessa Liana (3, A. Santoro and E. Neri; Rome, Adriano, 2 June 1929), and several songs.

DESMOND SHAWE-TAYLOR/ALAN BLYTH

Schipper, Emil (Zacharias) (b Vienna, 19 Aug 1882; d Vienna, 20 July 1957). Austrian baritone. He studied in Milan, then made his début in 1904 at the Neues Deutsches Theater, Prague, as Telramund. After engagements at Linz, the Vienna Volksoper and the Vienna Hofoper, in 1916 he joined the Munich Hofoper, where he remained until 1922; he then returned to the Vienna Staatsoper until 1938 and was made an Austrian Kammersänger. In Munich he sang Meister Florian in the 1920 revised version of Schreker's Das Spielwerk und die Prinzessin and Barak in the first performance there of Die Frau ohne Schatten. He appeared regularly at Covent Garden (1924–8) as the Dutchman, Kurwenal, Hans Sachs, Wotan, Telramund, John the Baptist and Amonasro, in Chicago (1928–9) and at the Teatro Colón. Schipper sang Agamemnon in Iphigénie en Aulide at the 1930 Salzburg Festival and returned there in 1935–6 as Kurwenal. He also made guest appearances in France, the Netherlands, Spain and Belgium. His voice was powerful and dramatic, but he did not always use it with subtlety. He married the mezzo-contralto Maria Olszewska, with whom he recorded a notable version of the Wanderer-Erda encounter from the third act of Siegfried.

HAROLD ROSENTHAL/ALAN BLYTH

Schippers, Thomas (b Kalamazoo, MI, 9 March 1930; d New York, 16 Dec 1977). American conductor. After studying at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and privately with Olga Samaroff, he won second prize in 1948 in a young conductors' contest sponsored by the Philadelphia Orchestra. His professional conducting début was the same year with the Lemonade Opera Company in New York. In 1950 he became conductor of Menotti's The Consul shortly after its première, beginning an association with the composer that continued with Schippers's appointment as music director of Menotti's Festival of Two Worlds at Spoleto, where his impassioned but natural, fluent performances became increasingly admired. He joined the staff of the New York City Opera in 1951, and in 1955 made débuts with the New York PO, at the Metropolitan Opera, and at La Scala, Milan. In 1963 he conducted the new production of Die Meistersinger at Bayreuth. Having established himself as a young American opera conductor of international stature, he was a natural choice to conduct the première of Barber's Antony and Cleopatra when the Metropolitan opened its new house at Lincoln Center in September 1966. Schippers was probably best known for his operatic work, particularly in the Romantic repertory, and made notable recordings of, among other works, Il trovatore and La forza del destino. He was also music director of the Cincinnati SO from 1970 until his death, and became a professor at the Cincinnati College–Conservatory of Music in 1972.

BERNARD JACOBSON

Schira, Francesco (Vincenzo) (b Malta, 21 Aug 1809; d London, 15 Oct 1883). Italian composer, conductor and teacher. He studied under Basili at the Milan Conservatory and, at the age of 23, was commissioned by La Scala to write an opera, Elena e Malvina, which was well received at its first production in 1832. This led to an eight-year appointment as director of music to the Teatro de S Carlos in Lisbon, where he was also professor of harmony and counterpoint at the conservatory. His elder brother, Vincenzo Schira (d 1857), conductor and ballet composer, succeeded him at the S Carlos.

After a brief visit to Paris in 1842, Schira was appointed director of music at the newly opened Princess's Theatre in London. In 1843 he conducted a short season under Alfred Bunn's management at Covent Garden, and in the following year joined Bunn at Drury Lane on the resignation of Benedict as conductor. He remained there intermittently until 1847, conducting both foreign adaptations and a number of English operas. The orchestra at the time was said to be indifferent and the Illustrated London News was less than impressed with Bunn's parsimony and Schira's conducting ability (27 September 1845). In 1848 Bunn again managed a three-month season at Covent Garden, with Schira conducting and Sims Reeves making his début at the theatre. Schira's opera Kenilworth, after Scott, was rehearsed but not produced, but the Princess's Theatre gave well-received productions of his operas Mina in 1849 and Thérèse, or The Orphan of Geneva in 1850.

Schira conducted Bunn's 1852 season at Drury Lane, but thereafter he devoted himself to teaching singing (his most famous pupil was Louisa Pyne), while continuing to compose. His opera Niccolò de' Lapi was produced at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1863. In 1875 in Venice he achieved his greatest success with the first complete production of Selvaggia, but after Lia (orginally composed for Naples in 1865) in 1876 he composed no more. He was totally opposed to any style other than the Italian, which led the Musical Times to declare, on his death, that 'his music suffered mainly from the disavantage of being out of fashion'. He was awarded the title Commendatore by Umberto I. Despite his narrow musical tastes, Schira was, after Verdi, one of the outstanding Italian opera composers of his generation. Arditi, who conducted the première of Niccolò de' Lapi, justly described the work as 'a patriotic opera ... written in the genuine Italian style ... fervid, melodious, and free from pretence or assumption'. Selvaggia, his masterpiece, is even more powerful: its through-composed texture sustains a consistent dramatic tension which clearly foreshadows the methods of Puccini.

Schirmer. American firm of music publishers. One of the largest and most important of its kind in the USA, it began in New York as an outgrowth of the Kerksieg & Bruesing Company (founded 1848), of which Gustav Schirmer (b Königsee, 19 Sept 1829; d Eisenach, 5 Aug 1893) became manager in 1854 (he had gone to New York in 1837). With Bernard Beer, Schirmer took over the business in 1861, and in 1866 he bought out Beer's interest and established the house of G. Schirmer, Music Publishers, Importers and Dealers. As its activities increased and the firm grew in standing, it moved several times to new quarters and in 1891 founded its own engraving and printing plant – one of the few maintained into the 1980s by American music publishing houses (it ceased to operate in 1984). After Gustav's death the business was incorporated under the management of his sons: Rudolph Edward (b New York, 22 July 1859; d Santa Barbara, CA, 19 Aug 1919) was president, and Gustave (b New York, 18 Feb 1864; d Boston, 15 July 1907) secretary. When Rudolph died, Gustave's son, also named Gustave (b Boston, 29 Dec 1890; d Palm Beach, FL, 28 May 1965), succeeded him as president; he was followed in 1921 by W. Rodman Fay. In May 1929 Carl Engel assumed the presidency and held that office until his death in 1944. Gustave Schirmer (grandson of the founder) was again made president and was subsequently succeeded by Rudolph Tauhert, Edward P. Murphy and John A. Santuccio. In 1964 Associated Music Publishers, with a catalogue including many internationally known composers, became a subsidiary of G. Schirmer. In 1968 the firm was acquired by the American book publisher Macmillan. In 1986 the music publishing activities were taken over by Music Sales, and its publications distributed by Hal Leonard; the book publishing was retained by Macmillan, as Schirmer Books.

Schirmer publishes for all media; its catalogue includes works by Stephen Albert, Barber, Bloch, Corigliano, Creston, Anthony Davis, Morton Gould, Griffes, Roy Harris, Kernis, Laderman, Menotti, Douglas Moore, John Jacob Niles, Schumann, Bright Sheng, Tan Dun and Thomson. In addition, Schirmer as an ASCAP affiliate and AMP, as a BMI affiliate, are the sole American representatives for 40 publishers, including Bote & Bock, Chester, Wilhelm Hansen, Max Eschig, Faber Music, Salabert, the Russian Authors' and Composers' Society and Hans Sikorski. In 1974 they were assigned American publishing and related rights to all Soviet music through an agreement with VAAP, the Soviet copyright agency. In 1989 Schirmer became the representative of Dunvagen Music, publisher of the works of Philip Glass. At the same time the firm acquired the catalogue of Shawnee Press. Among the firm's publications are Schirmer's Library of Musical Classics (introduced in 1892), opera and orchestral study scores and instructional materials for all instruments. Schirmer maintains a vast hire library of the larger 20th-century works as well as the standard repertory.

The lexicographer Theodore Baker served as Schirmer's literary editor and translator, 1892–1926, and was active in founding The Musical Quarterly in 1915. Its first editor, Oscar G. Sonneck, joined the firm in 1917 and was vice-president from 1921 to his death in 1928. Engel succeeded him on The Musical Quarterly. Among later editors and directors at the firm were Nathan Broder (Director of Publications, 1945–54), Paul Henry Lang (editor of The Musical Quarterly, 1945–73), Hans W. Heinsheimer (Director of Publications, 1947–74) and William Holab (Director of Publications 1995–2000). Richard Brundage succeeded Holab in 2000 as Editor of Publications. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, which has been regularly updated, was first published by Schirmer in 1900.

Schirmer, E.C. American firm of music publishers. It was founded in Boston in 1921 by Ernest Charles Schirmer (b Mount Vernon, NY, 15 March 1865; d Waban, MA, 15 Feb 1958), who had previously worked in New York for his uncle Gustave Schirmer (1829–93), also a music publisher, and had later become a partner in the Boston Music Company. When Ernest Schirmer died, E.C. Schirmer jr became president and remained the head of the firm until his death on 6 May 1966, when Robert MacWilliams became president. MacWilliams died in 1985 when the firm was bought by Robert Schuneman. In addition to standard works, Schirmer publishes electronic music, the choral repertory of the Harvard University, Radcliffe, Vassar and Wellesley college glee clubs, the St Dunstan Edition of Sacred Music and books on music theory and appreciation. American composers in its catalogue include Avshalomov, Ernst Bacon, Howard Boatwright, Copland, David Diamond, Felciano, Korte, Libby Larsen, Donald Martino, Alice Parker, Perera, Pinkham, Piston, Rorem, Conrad Susa and Randall Thompson.

Schiske, Karl (Hubert Rudolf) (b Raab [now Győr, Hungary], 12 Feb 1916; d Vienna, 16 June 1969). Austrian composer. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory, where his teachers included Roderich Bass, Julius Varga, Kanitz and others, at the Vienna Musikhochschule and at the University of Vienna (DPhil 1942). After working as a freelance composer, he was appointed professor of composition at the Vienna Music Academy in 1952. He was also involved in the Darmstadt summer courses (from 1955) and served as visiting professor at the University of California, Riverside (1966–7). His other activities included organizing the music programme for the Innsbruck Jugendkulturwochen (1956–66). His music shows the influence of Franco-Flemish polyphony and the styles of Palestrina, Bach, Stravinsky, Hindemith and Webern. Although receptive to new ideas, he never yielded to trends. His early works are vital and sparkling. Later, he adopted a reductionist aesthetic characterized by tonal purity and textural transparency. A strict use of polyphony and serial techniques, and an economy and synthesis of thematic material were central aspects of his style.

SIGRID WIESMANN

Schisma. A tiny intervallic quantity. Until the 19th century the term was liable to be used for various intervals, too small to be used melodically, encountered within theoretical calculations. According to J.G. Walther's Musicalisches Lexicon (Leipzig, 1732), for example, a schisma is taken as half a COMMA. In 19th- and 20th-century writings (for instance, P. Lichtenthal's Dizionario e bibliografia della musica, Milan, 1826) it refers to the difference between the Pythagorean and syntonic commas, which is also the difference between a pure major 3rd and a Pythagorean diminished 4th (that is, the amount by which D♯–G is smaller than a pure major 3rd if the 5ths and 4ths G–D–A–E–B–F♯–C♯–G♯–D♯ are pure). This difference, 1·954 cents, is about 1% of a whole tone and is so close to 1/12 of the Pythagorean comma (1/12·008) that the term 'schisma' may also refer to the amount by which 5ths are tuned smaller than pure in the system of equal temperament.

Schjelderup, Gerhard (Rosenkrone) (b Kristianstad, 17 Nov 1859; d Benediktbeuern, 29 July 1933). Norwegian composer and writer on music. Despite an uneven quality in his works, he is regarded as the most important musical dramatist among Norwegian composers. In 1878–84 he studied in Paris, with Savard and Massenet (composition) and Franchomme (cello). In 1889 he studied stage technique in Karlsruhe. He lived the rest of his life mostly in Germany, where he became professor in Dresden and Munich. He received a grant from the Norwegian government from 1910. Despite living in exile, he remained an active figure in Norwegian musical life. He wrote biographies of Grieg and Wagner, and, together with Sandvik, wrote the first history of Norwegian music, published in 1921.

A turning-point in Schjelderup's development came after attending a performance of Wagner's Ring cycle in Karlsruhe in 1887. From then onwards he devoted himself primarily to the composition of musical dramas, although his aesthetic programme differed from that of Wagner, intending 'something more intimate … [he aimed] to open humanity's heart and reveal the riches which often hide behind the simplest exterior'. Some of his works – eight were performed on European stages during his lifetime – achieved great success in their day, but have not remained in the repertory. After his début opera Østenfor sol og vestenfor maane ('East of the Sun and West of the Moon', 1890) he wrote all his librettos himself. Typically, their theme was the victory over death of an ideal love. The texts, however, are regarded as the operas' weakest part, together with the lack of dramatic feeling. Their strengths lie in the detailed musical characterization and fine lyrical atmosphere. Schjelderup's musical language remained late Romantic, with thorough thematic work and at times complex harmony.

ERLING E. GULDBRANDSEN

Schjelderup-Ebbe, Dag (b Oslo, 10 Dec 1926). Norwegian musicologist and composer. After training at the Oslo Conservatory he studied musicology at the University of California, Berkeley with Bukofzer and Boyden (MA 1950) and composition with Elkus. He continued his studies with Gurlitt at Freiburg University (1956–7) and with Gurvin at the University of Oslo, where he took the doctorate in 1965 with a study of Grieg's early years, which revealed much new material. He began to teach at Oslo University on his return from the USA (1950) and was later appointed senior lecturer (1963) and professor (1973) at the Institute for Musicology, retiring in 1980. As a music critic he worked for the Oslo paper Vårt land (1957–61) before joining the staff of Verdens gang (1961). He was a founder-member (from 1962), and later chairman (1970–80), of the editorial committee for Edvard Grieg's Complete Works (Frankfurt, 1977–95), for which he was the sole editor of the first four volumes and co-editor of volume xii. He was awarded the Edvard Grieg Prize in 1981 and he later received honorary doctorates from St Olaf College, Minnesota (1993), and the University of Münster (1996). He was elected a member of the Norwegian Academy of Science and Letters in 1990. Schjelderup-Ebbe's compositions include a work for chorus, The Ship of Youth (Oslo, 1969), performed at the Bergen International Festival in 1967, a Suite for Young People for piano (Oslo, 1972), Humoreske for horn and piano (1976) and other chamber works.

JOHN BERGSAGEL

Schlaepfer, Jean-Claude (b Geneva, 11 Jan 1961). Swiss composer. After studying piano with Sébastien Risler he gained a diploma in music education and a prize from the Geneva Conseil d'État, along with a composition prize (class of Pierre Wissmer and Jean Balissat). He then went to study with Betsy Jolas in Paris. Besides composing, he teaches harmony and analysis at the two conservatories in Geneva. From his first compositions, Schlaepfer attracted attention in French-speaking Switzerland for his professionalism. His Stabat Mater (1990) was highly successful when performed by the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, an opportunity rarely given to any composer under 30. Since then there has been a steady succession of commissions from important institutions (Suisse Romande Radio, the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, the Tibor Varga violin competition, the Settimane Musicali d'Ascona and others).

Schlaepfer rarely discusses his compositional procedures and techniques. It is through his works alone that he has won over a large group of admirers, without ever yielding to complacency.

JEAN-PIERRE AMANN

Schlag (i). German family of organ builders. In 1831 Christian Gottlieb Schlag (b Staschwitz, 27 Feb 1803; d Schweidnitz [now Świdnica], 10 March 1889) took over the organ-building workshop of Kiesewetter at Jauer, and from 1834 he and his brother Johann Karl (b Staschwitz, 30 Nov 1808; d Schweidnitz, after 1869) carried on the business at Schweidnitz. In 1869 Christian Gottlieb's sons Theodor (b Schweidnitz, 18 April 1847; d Schweidnitz, 2 May 1912) and Oskar (b Schweidnitz, 16 June 1848; d Schweidnitz, 26 Nov 1918) became partners in the firm, which then became known as Schlag & Söhne. Oskar later founded the Association of German Organ Builders in 1891, and was its first president. The proprietors were appointed official organ builders to the royal court in 1900, and they were joined by Theodor's sons Reinhold (b Schweidnitz, 1874; d Pomerania, after 1952) and Bruno (b Schweidnitz, 1879; d Hof, 1952) in 1903.

By about 1870 Schlag & Söhne had become the leading organ-building firm in Silesia. In 1888 they built an organ for the Philharmonie, Berlin, on which Bruckner performed in 1891. In Silesia they obtained the important commissions for the Breslau Konzerthaus (1898) and for the Musiksaal of Breslau University (1906). They made repairs and 'modernizations' to historic 18th-century instruments, including the organs in the church of the Holy Cross, Hirschberg (now Jelenia Góra; 1859); the former Cistercian church in Grüssau (now Krzeszów; 1873–4); the pilgrimage church, Wartha (1875); St Elisabeth, Breslau (1878–9); the Gnadenkirche, Landeshut (now Kamienna Góra; 1882); Sts Peter and Paul, Neisse (now Nysa; 1883); the parish church, Glatz (now Kłodzo; 1893); and Sts Peter and Paul, Görlitz (1894). The new organ for the Frauenkirche, Görlitz, brought the number of instruments on which the firm had worked to 1000. The firm was dissolved sometime after 1918.

Like other contemporary builders in Germany, the Schlag family laid most emphasis on foundation stops. Their organs had complete Principal choruses on all manuals (Christian Gottlieb had studied the Baroque organs of Hamburg and Lübeck in 1865), stopped Diapasons, Flutes and Strings. Their larger organs consisted of Hauptwerk (with reeds represented by Trompete 8′), Schwellwerk (with Oboe, Vox humana or Klarinette 8′) and Pedal (with Posaune 16′ and Trompete 8′); there would also be a Solo Organ with reeds such as Orchestral oboe and Tuba mirabilis on wind pressures of up to 30 cm (Oskar had studied with Henry Willis in London). When rebuilding old organs, they kept as much historic pipework as possible (e.g. 1859, organ by J.M. Röder, *c*60%, and 1893, Joachim Wagner, *c*90%).

After 1870 Johann Karl's sons Karl (d Schweidnitz, 1873) and Heinrich (d Liegnitz, 1903) founded in Schweidnitz the firm of Gebrüder Schlag, later managed by Christian Gottlieb's nephew, Ernst (b Profen, 1852; d Schweidnitz, 1941); this firm mainly built small organs in Silesia.

Schlager, Karlheinz (b Bamberg, 8 Oct 1938). German musicologist. From 1958 to 1964 he studied musicology with Stäblein and Eggebrecht at the University of Erlangen-Nuremberg, with modern German literature and medieval German philology as subsidiary subjects. He took the doctorate at Erlangen in 1964 with a dissertation on alleluia melodies in 10th- and 11th-century manuscripts; this work was complemented by his Habilitationsschrift on the late medieval alleluia melodies (1986). He was Stäblein's research assistant (1964–7), and a research assistant at the Erlangen musicology institute (1976–91), where he directed the microfilm archive of chant sources. He was also an editor of RISM, A/I in Kassel, 1968–76. He was chair of the department of music education at Bamberg University, 1984–6, and he was appointed professor and department chair of musicology at the Katholische Universität, Eichstätt in 1991. His own special interests centre on palaeographic research and style criticism of medieval monophonic music.

Schlee, Thomas Daniel (b Vienna, 26 Oct 1957). Austrian composer, organist, musicologist and artistic administrator. He studied at the Vienna Hochschule für Musik with Michael Radulescu (organ, 1976–83) and Francis Burt (composition, 1982–5), among others, at the University of Vienna (1976–84), where he completed a dissertation on Messiaen, and at the Paris Conservatoire, where his teachers included Messiaen (composition) and Langlais (organ). He has served as music drama adviser at the Salzburg Landestheater (1986–9), music director of the Brucknerhaus, Linz (1990–98), and project director of the Guardini Foundation, Berlin (from 1995, chair 1998). In 1999 he was appointed deputy intendant of the Beethoven Festival in Bonn. He became a Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres in 1990.

Schlee's various professional activities, taken together, represent a consistent concern for musical trends and musical performance. Although he has chosen his compositional material and methods deliberately, his approach to music remains extremely poetic, even religious or metaphysical. He shapes sounds, rhythmic elements, melodies and harmonic colours into forms that develop organically in an analogous fashion to tonal structures. His discourse is rich in nuances, conflicts and contrasts. He has striven to achieve beauty, not by reprocessing the ideals of the past, but by engaging in a search of his own. (LZMÖ)

Schlegel, Leander (b Oegstgeest, nr Leiden, 2 Feb 1844; d Overveen, nr Haarlem, 20 Oct 1913). Dutch pianist and composer. He studied the violin at the Leiden music school and the piano and composition at the royal music school (The Hague) and at the Leipzig Conservatory. He also took lessons with S. Jadassohn. After completing his education he was music director in Brunswick for a short time, and he also toured with the violinist Wilhelmj. From 1870 to 1898 he directed the Haarlem music school of the Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst, teaching the piano, violin and singing, and he conducted its choral society from 1871 to 1881. After 1898 he directed his own music school. Together with the pianist Vink he founded a Wagner Society in Haarlem in 1873. His most important compositions, piano works and songs, however, show him to have been influenced by Schumann, Brahms and Kirchner. Most of his piano works are short character-pieces; some are based on German literature (Der arme Peter op.5 on Heine's Buch der Lieder, opp.7 and 10 on Goethe's Faust). His Passacaglia op.31 for two pianos is based on ascending and descending scales. His orchestral works include Der sächsische Prinzenraub, symphonisches Tongemälde op.21 (ed. D. van Heuvel, Amsterdam, 1996) and a violin concerto op.33, performed in Vienna in 1911. He also wrote chamber music, including a violin sonata op.34, performed in Berlin in 1911. His songs have some impressionistic characteristics.

Schleiermacher, Steffen (b Halle, Saxony, 3 May 1960). German pianist and composer. He studied at the Leipzig Musikhochschule (1980–85), where his teachers included Siegfried Thiele and Friedrich Schenker (composition), Gerhard Erber (piano) and Günter Blumhagen (conducting), at the DDR Akademie der Künste with Friedrich Goldmann (composition), and in Cologne with Aloys Kontarsky (piano, 1989–90). He has served as artistic director of the Ensemble Avantgarde (founded in 1988), the Gewandhaus musica nova concert series (from 1990) and an annual January contemporary music festival in Leipzig (from 1992). As a pianist he has devoted himself exclusively to 20th-century music. His honours include an award from the Gaudeamus Competition (1985), the Hanns Eisler Prize (1989) the Schneider-Schott Music Prize (1992) and residencies at the Villa Massimo, Rome (1992) and the Cité des Arts, Paris (1998).

Instrumental in Schleiermacher's development as a composer was the music of Gesualdo, Bartók, Varèse and Feldman, as well as Indonesian gamelan and traditional Japanese temple music. Unmediated extremes employing a full range of traditional instrumental sounds are characteristic of his works. Every resolution proves to be a fallacy, however, as repetition turns to farce, traditional perspectives dissolve and central objectives disappear. A number of compositions reflect stories from Greek mythology or the inspiration of personal experience.

Schleifer (Ger.). See SLIDE (i).

Schleppend (Ger.: 'dragging'; present participle of schleppen). A word used both as a tempo modification and as an expression mark. It is, however, far less common than the characteristically Mahlerian instruction nicht schleppen! ('do not drag'), which had already been used by Beethoven, whose song Merkenstein op.100 is marked mässig, jedoch nicht schleppend ('moderate, but not dragging'). The Trio of Bruckner's Fourth Symphony is marked nicht zu schnell: keinesfalls schleppend ('not too fast, not under any circumstances dragging').

DAVID FALLOWS

Schlesinger. German firm of music publishers. Adolph Martin Schlesinger (b Sülz, Silesia, 4 Oct 1769; d Berlin, 11 Oct 1838) worked before 1795 as a book dealer in Berlin, and later incorporated printed music into his business; he founded the music-publishing house in April 1810. After his eldest son MAURICE SCHLESINGER had established himself in Paris and his second son Carl (1808–31) had died, the youngest son Heinrich (b Berlin, 1810; d Berlin, 14 Dec 1879) received full control in 1831. After his father's death he directed the business with his mother, Philippine, and alone from 1844. In 1864 he sold the firm to Robert Lienau.

From 1811 Schlesinger did its own printing, originally producing works by local Berlin composers. It soon established contacts with Spontini, Mendelssohn, Loewe and Weber, and in August 1814 secured the rights for Weber's works, becoming his original publisher. Encouragement from the Prussian royal house resulted in the Sammlung preussischer Armeemärsche, which comprised over 200 numbers. In 1819 Maurice Schlesinger established contact with Beethoven in Vienna, which led to the publication of opp.108–112, 132 and 135. Through the efforts of Adolph Bernhard Marx, who edited the Berliner allgemeine musikalische Zeitung (formerly the Zeitung für Theater und Musik, 1821–3) for Schlesinger from 1824 to 1830, the company issued the first edition of Bach's St Matthew Passion. With more than 2000 publications issued by 1836, Schlesinger ranked among the most important Prussian music publishers. Under Heinrich Schlesinger the firm acquired works by Berlioz, Cornelius, Liszt and notably Chopin's posthumous works. It concentrated on inexpensive editions of well-known works and, for copyright reasons, revised editions of earlier publications. The periodical Echo (1851–65), chiefly edited by Heinrich Schlesinger himself, was designed to revitalize the musical life of Berlin. A certain stagnation in the firm's activities was overcome when Robert Lienau took it over in 1864. A complete catalogue was never published.

RUDOLF ELVERS

Schlesinger, Maurice [Moritz Adolf] (b Berlin, 3 Oct 1798; d Baden-Baden, 25 Feb 1871). French music publisher of German descent. He was the eldest son of Adolf Martin Schlesinger, the Berlin publisher (see SCHLESINGER). Before settling in Paris in 1816, he served in the Prussian army (1814–15) and worked in his father's firm. In Paris he worked first for the bookseller Bossange Père. In summer 1819 he visited Beethoven in Vienna and Mödling to cultivate his friendship. Not later than July 1821 he started his own business, his first advertisements bearing Bossange's address, 13 quai Malaquais. By October 1822 he had moved to 107 rue Richelieu and by February 1824 he was at no.97 of the same street, where he remained until his retirement. In 1826 his business survived a fire that destroyed many manuscripts, including letters of Beethoven. On 20 November 1842 La France musicale announced that Schlesinger was gradually selling the stock of his firm; it was not until January 1846 that he sold the entire business to Louis Brandus. A few years later he retired to Baden-Baden.

Schlesinger's earliest publications include a series of piano-vocal scores of Mozart's operas, with title-page vignettes by Horace Vernet, and the full score of Mehúl's Valentine de Milan (1823). These were followed by numerous other operatic publications: piano-vocal scores of at least 50 operas and some two dozen full scores, including the first editions of Meyerbeer's Robert le diable and Les Huguenots, Halévy's La juive and at least 11 of his other works, Adam's Le postillon de Lonjumeau and Donizetti's La favorite. Among his employees between 1840 and 1842 was Wagner, who, then quite impoverished, was engaged to make piano (and other) arrangements of La favorite and of Halévy's La reine de Chypre. Schlesinger published a great deal of instrumental music. In the 1820s he brought out substantial collections of piano music by Moscheles, Weber and Hummel, and early in 1829 he announced complete editions first of Beethoven's piano works and then of his string trios, quartets and quintets. In 1822–3 he published authentic simultaneous first editions of Beethoven's opp.110 and 111 piano sonatas and in 1827 of the opp.130, 132, 133 and 135 string quartets. In the late 1820s and the early 1830s he published early works by Mendelssohn, Liszt and Berlioz; among his Berlioz publications were the first editions of the Huit scènes de Faust (see illustration), Liszt's piano arrangement of the Symphonie fantastique and the full scores of the Requiem, the Symphonie fantastique and the Symphonie funèbre et triomphale. He published about 40 of Chopin's works, most of them authentic simultaneous first editions. In the 1830s and 40s he also published a vast quantity of piano music by Heller, Thalberg, Lanner, Labitzky and the elder Johann Strauss. In all, about 4500 editions were published, judging by the chronological series of plate numbers.

Schlesinger's most enduring publication was the weekly Gazette musicale de Paris, first published on 5 January 1834 and serving a dual function: as an advertising medium for Schlesinger's publications and a general-interest magazine promoting German Romantic ideas in France. From November 1835 (vol.ii, no.44) it was merged with Revue musicale (edited by Fétis), subsequently appearing as Revue et gazette musicale; in 1880 it ceased publication. Among the early contributors were Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, George Sand, Balzac and Schumann. It is an invaluable source of information on music and music publishing in Paris.

Schlesinger was imaginative, reckless, hard in business and a considerable rogue. He is said to be accurately portrayed by Flaubert as Jacques Arnoux in L'éducation sentimentale; Madame Arnoux is just as closely modelled on Schlesinger's wife, Elisa, with whom Flaubert was for many years in love. Irascible by nature, Schlesinger not infrequently became entangled with his colleagues in wrangles over publication rights or allegedly defamatory statements; his clashes with Escudier in 1839, with Troupenas in 1841 and with Rossini in 1843 provide three interesting examples documented in La France musicale (1839–43). The autographs from his estate were auctioned by Liepmannssohn in Berlin on 4 November 1907.

RICHARD MACNUTT

Schlick, Arnolt (b ?Heidelberg, *c*1460; d ?Heidelberg, after 1521). German organist and composer. The assertions that he came from Bavaria, from the Swabian-Alemannic area or from the southern half of Bohemia are not justifiable. According to Pietzsch's investigations, Schlick's use of language reflects that spoken around Heidelberg at the beginning of the 16th century, so he probably came from the Heidelberg area. In 1486 he played at Maximilian I's election to the imperial throne: an eye-witness reported that 'the organ was played by a blind man ... it was quite nice to hear.' (Schlick's son, Arnolt the younger, confirmed that his father was blind in a foreword added to the Tabulaturen.) In 1490–91 Schlick visited the Netherlands, no doubt because of an epidemic of plague in Heidelberg; in 1491 he went to Strasbourg for the inauguration of the cathedral organ, built by Krebs; in 1495 he went to Worms for the Diet, where he was helpful and considerate to his subsequent rival Sebastian Virdung. In the next few years, he tested a number of organs: in 1503 the small choir organ of St Georg in Hagenau (now Haguenau, Alsace), in 1505 the Speyer Cathedral organ, in 1510 the Hagenau organ again (it had presumably been enlarged). In 1509 he received a life appointment at the palatine court. In 1511 Maximilian granted his request for the copyright of his Spiegel der Orgelmacher und Organisten and his Tabulaturen etlicher lobgesang, which protected him against unauthorized reprinting for ten years. In August 1516 Schlick travelled to Torgau, where he met Hofhaimer at the Saxon court. As an organ consultant he went to Neustadt an der Haardt in 1516 and Hagenau in 1520. It is not known whether he was at the coronation of Charles V in Aachen in October 1520; his reference to it in the dedication to Ascendo ad Patrem meum, 'so I thought that I would join in the fun', does not necessarily point to his active participation. The last contemporary document to mention Schlick is a bill of 1521, which states that he had 'heard and examined' the renovated great organ of St Georg, Hagenau. The foreword to the Tabulaturen reports that he had 'for many years played the organ in front of emperors, kings, electors, princes and other spiritual and temporal lords', suggesting that he had travelled a great deal and thus won himself acclaim far afield as an exceptional organist and consultant.

Ex.1 Arnolt Schlick: Ascendo ad Patrem meum a 10

Opening of the 'Salve regina' from Schlick's 'Tabulaturen etlicher lobgesang' (Mainz: P. Schoeffer, 1512)

In Spiegel der Orgelmacher und Organisten, the first work published in German about organ building and organ playing, Schlick gave an accurate insight into the skills of the organ builder. In ten chapters he dealt with the measurements of pipes, the alloying and working of the metal to be used, the choice of registers and the nature of wind-chests, bellows etc, and gave advice on tuning and on the most suitable positions for an organ (see also ORGAN, §V, 3). In the Tabulaturen etlicher lobgesang, the first printed German organ tablatures, Schlick published a number of his own compositions as practical complement to his Spiegel der Orgelmacher. In the introduction he discussed the meaning of the notation, defended himself against Virdung's accusations (see Virdung's Musica getutscht, Basle, 1511/R), and categorized the compositions. The book contains nine works for organ, in three to five parts, 12 lute pieces with 'zwo stimmen zu zwicken und ein zu singen', and three works for lute with 'drei stimmen zu zwicken'. Among the organ works a five-part Salve regina (see illustration) is outstanding; long sections use an imitation technique to be found later in, for example, the music of Sweelinck. In particular, the other parts anticipate motifs which appear later in the cantus firmus. Schlick's skilful writing of counterpoint can also be clearly seen in an organ work based on the German hymn Maria zart. Almost every phrase of the melody, which is divided into 13 sections, is treated contrapuntally, often in the form of a free canon. Equal in stature to these works are the eight canonic versets based on the sequence Gaude Dei genitrix and the ten-part piece on the antiphon Ascendo ad Patrem meum, found in Trent by Lunelli. In his introduction Schlick wrote of the settings of Gaude Dei genitrix that they were 'something new and of a rare skill: some of them unheard ... no two alike, but each a different counterpoint'; also that 'for each composition he had found and made its own rule'; that he had written the chorale Ascendo ad Patrem for ten parts 'which can be played on the organ with four parts on the pedals and six on the manuals'. These settings show how contrapuntal parts can be woven around a cantus firmus: the melody of the chorale is set against a faster accompaniment, both parts being supported by additional voices a 3rd, 4th or 6th apart. In some ways Ascendo ad Patrem is the climax of Schlick's compositional career. Played on the organ, it is unique in the music up to and including the early 16th century. The opening bars (ex.1) may give an impression of the monumental scale of this work.

Thus Schlick's historical importance does not rest only on his achievements as a theorist and on his widespread reputation as a tester of organs and an organist. His achievements as a composer, which have remained in the background, must also be included in the overall picture of a musician who left his mark on the history of organ music in the 16th century.

HANS JOACHIM MARX

Schlick, Barbara (b Würzburg, 21 July 1943). German soprano. She studied singing at the conservatory in her home town and later with Hilde Wesselmann in Essen. She started her career as a member of the Adolf Scherbaum Baroque Ensemble in 1966; later she toured with, among others, the Monteverdi Choir of Hamburg under Jürgen Jürgens. From early on she specialized in music of the Baroque and Classical periods and worked with leading specialists such as Reinhard Goebel, Philippe Herreweghe, Ton Koopman, Sigiswald Kuijken and William Christie in virtually all major musical centres of Europe, the USA, Canada and the former USSR. She teaches at the Staatliche Hochschule für Musik in Würzburg. Schlick's numerous recordings include all the major choral works by Bach, many of his cantatas and several Baroque operas, notably Handel's Giulio Cesare and Hasse's Piramo e Tisbe. Schlick used her exceptionally pure and fluent soprano with touching expressiveness and an acute sense of style.

MARTIN ELSTE

Schlick, Rudolf (b Meissen; fl 1588). German theorist. In the foreword to his treatise he described himself as a doctor of medicine. He was one of several widely educated humanists who had a command of musical theory without being professional musicians. His treatise Exercitatio, qua musices origo prima, cultus antiquissimus, dignitas maxima et emolumenta … breviter ac dilucide exponuntur (Speyer, 1588) deals with the origin, development and uses of music. On the question of origin he quoted on the one hand, as was customary, the testimony of the Bible and the church fathers, and on the other the sayings of classical antiquity. Both sources were considered equally valid; according to Schlick, Greek teaching on the origins of music is distinguished from the Christian only by the fact that the Greeks, through the wiles of the Devil, believed in several gods. The development of music is presented in brief and general terms; in Schlick's opinion music had reached unsurpassable heights in his time, not least because the correct form and method had been discovered for teaching it. He demonstrated the value of music by pointing out its function in church of proclaiming the praise of God, and its influence on the human affections, and stressed the miracles worked by Greek music. He also apparently understood something of the practical music of his own time; he gave no detailed explanation of the modes, but rejected the extension of their number from eight to twelve. (See also EitnerQ; J.N. Forkel: Allgemeine Litteratur der Musik, Leipzig, 1729/R, p.505).

MARTIN RUHNKE

Schlicker, Herman L(eonhard) (b Hohentrüdingen, nr Wassertrüdingen, 31 Jan 1902; d Buffalo, NY, 4 Dec 1974). American organ builder of German birth. He was apprenticed in Germany to Steinmeyer, and later worked for other European builders, including Marcussen of Denmark. Schlicker emigrated to the USA in 1925, working first for the Wurlitzer firm, then for Tellers of Erie, Pennsylvania. In 1932 he established his own company in Buffalo. He was one of the pioneers in the USA in the move to a more classical style of organ. In 1950 his firm developed an electro-pneumatic wind-chest with expansion chambers, and in 1963 commenced the building of mechanical-action instruments; ten years later these constituted approximately 45% of the company's output. The work of the Schlicker Organ Co. was continued by his widow, Alice Hagman Schlicker, and his son-in-law, Rolfe Dinwoodie. In 1981 the Schlicker Organ Co. was purchased by Conrad and Theresa Van Viegen, who became its president and vice-president respectively. The size and output of the firm were significantly reduced and in 1993 it was sold to J. Stanton Peters, a former employee, who became its president, and Norman P. Rockwell, its business administrator. Among the Schlicker patents are a new slider-chest pallet-valve, and a vacuum-operated draw-stop action. The firm's work is found throughout North America; its important organs include those at Valparaiso University, Indiana (1959), the First Congregational Church, Los Angeles (1969), the First Methodist Church, Baton Rouge, Louisiana (1972), the First Presbyterian Church, Hollywood, California (1976), St Peter's, Albany, New York (1977), and St James's, Los Angeles (1995).

BARBARA OWEN

Schlimbach. German family of organ builders. Johann Caspar Schlimbach (1777–1861), after being apprenticed to Anton Walter and Franz Martin Seuffert in Vienna, settled in 1806 in Königshofen im Grabfeld, eastern Franconia, as an organ builder and piano maker. In 1810 he built the aeoline, a keyboard instrument with tuned metal reeds fastened after the fashion of the jew's harp; the instrument was a development of experiments made by his cousin Bernhard Eschenbach (1769–1852). Apart from organ building, Schlimbach was concerned principally with piano making and harmonium building. Of his five sons who became instrument makers, Martin (1811–1901) managed his father's business until the 1880s; Gustav (1818–94) moved in 1845 to Speyer am Rhein, where he was active as an organ builder until at least 1889; and Balthasar (1807–96) moved to Würzburg, where he took over Seuffert's abandoned workshop and set up business under his own name. Balthasar, his son Martin Josef (1841–1914) and his grandson Alfred (1875–1952) developed the firm into the leading organ building establishment of eastern Franconia and built about 260 new organs. This firm, the oldest in eastern Franconia, ceased to exist during World War I.

Schlosser, Max [Karl] (b Amberg, Bavaria, 17 Oct 1835; d Utting am Ammersee, 2 Sept 1916). German tenor. After singing in Zürich, St Gallen and Augsburg, in 1868 he was engaged at the Hofoper, Munich, where he remained until 1904. He sang David in the first performance of Die Meistersinger (1868) and Mime in the first performance of Das Rheingold (1869). He also sang Mime in Siegfried at Bayreuth in the first complete Ring cycle (1876). In 1882 he accompanied Angelo Neumann's Wagner tour of Europe, singing Mime in the first London performance of the Ring. His repertory included Rossini (Almaviva in Barbiere) and Weber (Max in Der Freischütz). Towards the end of his career he sang baritone roles, including Beckmesser and the Nightwatchman in Die Meistersinger, which he sang at his farewell performance in Munich, in his 70th year.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Schlünz, Annette (b Dessau, 23 Sept 1964). German composer. She entered H.J. Wenzel's composition class for children at the age of 12 and later studied at the Dresden Musikhochschule (1983–7) where her teachers included Udo Zimmermann (composition) and Rudolf Neuhaus (conducting). While teaching at the Dresden Akademie für Musik und Theater (1987–92), she completed her training at the Berlin Akademie der Künste (1988–91) in Dittrich's masterclass. In 1994 she co-founded the Compagnie de Quatre, a Franco-German ensemble for which she has composed and played the recorder. Her honours include the Hanns Eisler Prize of Berlin Radio (1990) for her String Trio, the Heidelberg Women Artists' prize (1998) and a residency at the Villa Massimo, Rome (1999). Her over 40 works vary in character from extreme concision of method and reduction of material to outright asceticism. Her compositions grow out of motivic cells which are explored and developed through advanced performance techniques. Ich sehe den Traum des Wassers on texts by Pierre Garnier was inspired by the work of sculptor Daniel Depoutot. BETTINA BRAND

Schlusnus, Heinrich (b Braubach, 6 Aug 1888; d Frankfurt, 18 June 1952). German baritone. He trained as a postal official but also studied singing in Frankfurt and made a successful début at Hamburg in 1915 as the Herald in Lohengrin. He sang at the Nuremberg Stadttheater (1915–17), then at the Berlin Staatsoper (1917–45), becoming their leading Verdi baritone. In 1932 he sang Guy de Montfort at the Berlin première of Les vêpres siciliennes, a role particularly suited to his ease of production over an extensive range. He toured extensively, to Amsterdam (1919), Barcelona (1922), Chicago (Wolfram, 1927) and Bayreuth (Amfortas, 1933). His voice, particularly easy in the high register, was steady and smooth, his style economical. Besides excelling in opera he was an outstanding lieder singer. His recordings are extensive.

chmahl. Swabian family of keyboard instrument makers. Johann Michael Schmahl (b 1654; d 2 April 1725) founded the Heilbronn branch of the firm and was succeeded by his son Johann Friedrich (b Steinheim, 12 March 1693; d Heilbronn, 19 July 1737), who in turn was succeeded by his brother, Johann Adam (b Heilbronn, Jan 1704; d Heilbronn, 20 June 1757), the most famous organ builder in the family. Georg Friedrich (i) (b Heilbronn, 15 Nov 1700; d Ulm, 26 Aug 1773), son of Johann Michael Schmahl, went to Augsburg in 1723, and then Ulm in 1729 where he founded a second branch, while Leonard Balthasar (1729–79), son of Johann Friedrich Schmahl, founded a third at Zittau, where he married the daughter of the organ builder J.J. Tamitius. All these members of the family were organ builders, and all made great use of foundation stops (with a preference for Viola da gamba, Gemshorn and Quintadena) and to a lesser extent, reeds (especially Krummhorn, Vox humana and Hautbois), and limited the pedal to stops of 16′ and 8′. They showed considerable variation in their separate uses of the diapason chorus. Georg Friedrich (i) also made clavichords, as did his son, Georg Friedrich (ii) (b Ulm, 16 Dec 1748; d Ulm, 23 Oct 1827).

Johann Matthäus Schmahl (b Ulm, 1 May 1734; d Ulm, 24 Nov 1793) was the son of Georg Friedrich (i). He was trained by his father as an organ builder, but produced pianos and other instruments as well. However only two pianos signed by him are known: a piano in the form of a horizontal harp with the inscription 'Johann Matthäus Schmahl, Ulm Anno 1771' (according to Kinsky, p.126, formerly in the possession of C.A. Pfeiffer), which seems not to have survived, and a harpsichord converted into a grand piano, signed 'Johannes Matthaeus Schmahl fecit Ulmae 1775' in Albstadt-Lautlingen. All other square pianos attributed to Schmahl, many of them in the form of a harp, are not signed and might possibly be by other makers. Examples can be found in Berlin, Halle and New York.

Christoph Friedrich Schmahl (b Heilbronn, 10 June 1739; d Regensburg, 15 May 1814), son of Johann Adam Schmahl, made keyboard instruments other than organs at Regensburg, where he married the daughter of the organ builder FRANZ JAKOB SPÄTH in 1772. After that he became a partner with his father-in-law in about 1774. The joint firm name, after Späth's death in 1786, continued in use until 1793. In 1802 Schmahl's son Jacob Friedrich (b Regensburg, 14 March 1777; d Regensburg, 1 Oct 1819) became his partner; a second son, Christian Carl (b Regensburg, 13 May 1782; d Regensburg, 1815), took over Schmahl's place on his retirement in 1812. After Christian Carl's early death, the firm was dissolved.

Späth & Schmahl were best known for their production of the keyboard instrument known as the TANGENT PIANO. It is not known whether they were influenced by other 18th-century experiments with tangent action, such as those by Marius (1717), Schröter (1739), Weltmann (1759), Merlin (1774) or Walton (1787).

Signed examples of tangent pianos by Späth & Schmahl include those at the Shrine to Music Museum, Vermillion, South Dakota (?1784, possibly built in Späth's lifetime), Leipzig (1790), Halle and Berlin (1793). Instruments signed by C.F. Schmahl alone include those in Nuremberg (1794), Vienna (1798), Munich (1800) and Bad Krozingen (1801). Examples of clavichords are found signed by Späth & Schmahl in Bad Krozingen (1787); by C.F. Schmahl in Regensburg (1790–4), Munich (1790–6) and Salzburg (1794); by C.F. Schmahl and sons in Berlin (1812) and in Munich; and by C.F. and G.F. Schmahl (ii) in Goudhurst (1807). Signed pianos with the Prellmechanik include grand pianos by C.F. Schmahl in Halle (1804) and Nuremberg (1809) and his sons in Nuremberg (1814).

Schmedes, Erik (b Gentofte, nr Copenhagen, 27 Aug 1866; d Vienna, 23 March 1931). Danish tenor. He studied in Berlin and Paris before making his baritone début at Wiesbaden in 1891. From 1894 to 1897 he was engaged at Dresden. In 1898 he went to Vienna, where he made his tenor début as Siegfried and remained through the great Mahler years until 1924, singing the heavier dramatic and Wagnerian parts with great success. In 1899 he sang Siegfried and Parsifal at Bayreuth, returning there until 1906, and in 1908–9 he appeared at the Metropolitan. He was the first Viennese Pedro (Tiefland), Palestrina (Pfitzner) and Herod. His style was rather declamatory, and he was an excellent actor. He recorded extensively from 1902, including extracts from his Wagner roles. One commentator wrote, with some justice, that his discs are 'numerous and nasty'.

Schmeltzl [Schmältzl], Wolfgang (b Kemnath, *c*1505; d St Lorenzen am Steinfeld, Lower Austria, *c*1564). German songbook editor and poet. He studied at the University of Vienna about 1523, but in the mid-1530s he married, had a child, and worked as a Protestant cantor in the city of Amberg in Bavaria. About 1540 he deserted his wife and child, moved back to Vienna, reconverted to Catholicism and became a priest, singing in the choir of the Salvatorkapelle and becoming a schoolmaster at the Schottenstift (1540–43). He is thought to have written the first plays in German verse for Viennese audiences (some of them school dramas) and to have taught the first German songs with choral odes to Viennese pupils. He edited Guter seltsamer un kunstreicher teutscher Gesang (Nuremberg, 1544), the earliest known songbook compiled in Vienna. A set of four partbooks, CH-Bu kk IV 19–22, contains one of the few complete copies of Schmeltzl's German lieder (RISM 1544[19]) with 13 humorous watercolour and pen illustrations, most probably drawn by the first owner of the partbooks, the Basle goldsmith Jacob Hagenbach. The songbook may have been intended for musical instruction at the Schottenstift and contains a number of quodlibets – some undoubtedly written by Schmeltzl himself – with many texts and tunes from popular German lieder. A German-texted version of Dormend'un giorno, a madrigal by Verdelot, and Die Schlacht vor Pavia or La bataglia taliana by Matthias Werrecore, a composer of Italian centoni, are the first entries in the songbook. References to Italian musical theories in Schmeltzl's Lobspruch der Stadt Wienn (Vienna, 1547) may have been the result of his association with Erasmus Lapicida, another composer who wrote music in the Italian style.

SUSAN FORSCHER WEISS

Schmelzer [Schmeltzer, Schmelzer von Ehrenruef], Andreas Anton (b Vienna, bap. 26 Nov 1653; d Vienna, 13 Oct 1701). Austrian composer and violinist, eldest son of Johann Heinrich Schmelzer. He was trained by his father and became a full member of the Vienna court orchestra on 16 February 1671. After his father's death in 1680, he assumed the position of official composer of ballet music at court (the decree of appointment is dated 27 February 1681), but ill-health forced him to relinquish it in 1693. He composed some 75 ballet suites (most in A-Wn) which, however, do not evince the great variety and musical interest of his father's. He generally reduced the number of movements to three, or even two. Archaic dances such as the trezza, traccanario, folia and moresca are rarely found, whereas the gavotte, saraband, bourrée, minuet, aria and intrada appear regularly. Melodic design and harmonic vocabulary are mannered and stylized. A few sonatas and suites (in S-Uu, but one sonata in A-Wm) are of questionable authenticity.

Schmelzer [Schmeltzer, Schmelzer von Ehrenruef], Johann Heinrich (b Scheibbs, Lower Austria, *c*1620–23; d Prague, between 29 Feb and 20 March 1680). Austrian composer and violinist. He was the leading Austrian composer of instrumental music before Biber and made an influential contribution to the development of the sonata and suite.

1. LIFE. Until recently, descriptions of his background have been based on his petition for ennoblement of 1673, in which he described his father (without mentioning his name) as a career soldier in the service of the Emperor Ferdinand III from about 1616 to 1645. According, however, to the marriage certificate of his sister Eva Rosina, dated May 1645, his father can be identified as Daniel Schmelzer, a baker by profession and burgher of Scheibbs. It is not known when J.H. Schmelzer arrived in Vienna, nor who gave him his musical training, but it seems likely that he studied with one of the mentors of court pupils: Antonio Bertali, Burckhardt Kugler or Giovanni Sansoni. The earliest documentary evidence, relating to his first marriage on 28 June 1643, designates him as an instrumentalist (cornettist) at the Stephansdom, Vienna. An imperial resolution of 1674, however, indicates that he began his service in the court chapel as early as 1635–6, probably as a violinist, the capacity in which he enjoyed his greatest fame throughout his life. He was officially appointed a violinist in the court orchestra on 1 October 1649. His position and functions during the next two decades are not entirely clear. The limited information available indicates that he wrote a good deal of music and won increasing fame as violinist and composer. Thus, in 1658 he was included as director of instrumental music in the retinue attending Leopold I at his coronation at Frankfurt. His three major collections of chamber music appeared between 1659 and 1664, and in 1660, in his Reise-Diarium, J.J. Müller called him 'the famous and nearly most distinguished violinist in all Europe'. His close relationship with the emperor can be seen not only in his receipt of gifts of money and golden chains (an indication of special favour) but also in the fact that the emperor sought his aid in the preparation of his own compositions.

On 13 April 1671 Schmelzer was appointed vice-Kapellmeister at the imperial court. From about the same time he had to assume an ever increasing share of the responsibilities of the Kapellmeister, the ailing G.F. Sances. There can be little doubt that his efficiency in this position, combined with his previous achievements and rising fame, rather than the supposed military service of his father, prompted Leopold I, in a decree dated 14 June 1673, to accede to his petition for ennoblement, whereupon he added 'von Ehrenruef' to his name; this title was also adopted by his sons. Not, however, until after Sances's death on 24 November 1679 was he officially appointed Kapellmeister. His application for the post, dated 18 December 1679 and submitted to the emperor in Prague, where the court had moved to escape the plague that was raging in Vienna, requested the appointment to be made retrospective to 1 July, but it was granted only as from 1 October. His enjoyment of the position was short-lived. His death from the plague, which had meanwhile reached Prague, must have taken place between 29 February (the date of the first performance of Antonio Draghi's La patienza di Socrate, for which he provided the ballet music) and 20 March 1680 (the date of a petition on behalf of his widow and children).

Schmelzer had three sons who became musicians. The eldest was ANDREAS ANTON SCHMELZER; the other two were also trained by him as violinists. About Georg Joseph (b Vienna, bap. 7 April 1655; d probably at Vienna, before 1701) nothing further is known. Peter Clemens [Clement] (b Vienna, bap. 28 June 1672; d Vienna, 20 Sept 1746) was accepted into the court orchestra by a decree dated 12 August 1692, but by 1729 he was incapacitated by a finger injury; he retired officially on 30 June 1740. It is questionable whether a Dialogus musicalis chelycus by a 'Clemente Mathia ab Ehrenruff' (in A-Wn) is by him; it comprises 12 sonatas for lute with organ continuo.

2. WORKS. Together with his older contemporaries Sances and Bertali and his younger contemporary Draghi, Schmelzer was one of the most important musicians at the Habsburg court between about 1655 and 1680. He produced a varied output, but he was influential only as a composer of instrumental music: ballet suites, which he wrote for nearly all performances of secular dramatic music at court from 1665 to 1680, and chamber music.

There was a great demand for ballet music at the court of Leopold I. Dance suites or individual dances were included in allegorical pageants that had evolved from the jousts and tournaments of earlier times, in disguisings and sleigh rides in which members of the imperial family frequently took part, in the majority of drammi per musica, serenatas etc., and even in a number of spoken dramas. The emphasis in most of these presentations was clearly on the visual: nymphs, tritons, centaurs, pages, soldiers, commedia dell'arte characters, spirits and even animals appeared in ornate costumes on elaborately decorated sets and carriages. The music composed by the official ballet composers Wolfgang Ebner, Schmelzer and his son Andreas Anton, and J.J. Hoffer is clearly functional and designed to draw attention to the visual spectacle and its allegorical significance and to provide the basis for the execution of the stylized movements of the dancers. Schmelzer's dance suites consist of between two and nine individual dances. Many begin with an intrada (or aria ad ingressum) and conclude with a retirada (or aria ad egressum). The intervening movements do not adhere to a consistent pattern but are a free alternation of a large number of different types. As with Schmelzer's independent dances, those most often found are the galliard, bourrée, saraband, gigue, gavotte, allemande and courante, interspersed with dances such as the trezza, folia, saltarello, moresca and traccanario. Some movements bear programmatic titles, among them Bauernmädel, Cacciatori, Battaglione, May Blumen, Aria viennense and Balletto francese. The terms 'balletto' and 'aria' are used as general descriptions rather than to indicate a specific type. Within each individual type there is a great deal of melodic and rhythmic variety, which stems mainly from Schmelzer's use of selected elements of Austrian folk music. Short but characteristic motifs, often based on a succession or alternation of octaves, 5ths, 6ths and major 3rds (which Nettl attributed to an imitation of the sounds of primitive wind instruments found in the folk music of the alpine region), follow one another in quick succession, frequently resulting in irregular phrase lengths. The unity of a suite is usually provided by means of melodic relationships, but here again Schmelzer achieved variety by incorporating movements in tonalities not closely related to its tonal centre. Although most of the ballets in Viennese sources exist only in partial score (highest part and basso continuo), the entire collection at Kroměříž survives in full score and shows Schmelzer's preference for the string quartet (usually violin and soprano, alto and bass violas) or string quintet (with an additional violin or viola), regardless of the scoring of the work for which the ballet music was written. In some notable instances, however, he departed from this practice and included parts marked 'piffari' (probably shawms), 'cornetti', 'clarini', 'trombe', 'trombone' and 'fagotti', in a single or polychoral setting (for example in the ballet suite to Draghi's Iphide greca, first performed on 12 July 1670).

In his sonatas Schmelzer favoured both the texture of two melody instruments (two violins or violin and viola da gamba) and continuo (as in Duodena selectarum sonatarum) and fuller textures (up to eight parts in Sacro-profanus concentus musicus), including polychoral treatment. Historically more important, however, are the six sonatas for violin and continuo forming his Sonatae unarum fidium (1664), the earliest publication devoted entirely to this genre in the German-speaking countries. Most of his sonatas rely strongly on the variation principle and consist of a number of short sections in contrasting metres and tempos, but in the solo violin sonatas these sections are extended to allow a greater display of virtuoso technique. Probably influenced by Bertali and Marco Uccellini, Schmelzer included passages of rapid scales and arpeggios, covering the full range of the instrument, but multi-stopping and scordatura tuning are still rare in his sonatas.

As a composer, Schmelzer (as early as the 1760s) attracted the attention of the Bishop of Olmütz, Karl Lichtenstein-Castelcorno, who established a correspondence with him by 1669. Schmelzer then sent numerous works to the bishop (especially dance suites), from whom the archive of the Arcibiskupsky in Kroměříž has, to date, received nearly 126 mostly unique works. In the context of his total output, Schmelzer's secular dramatic music and German songs must be considered peripheral. He seems to have composed his numerous liturgical works (most of them lost) in the 1670s during his period as vice-Kapellmeister. Those that survive display the Venetian influence so prevalent among his Italian contemporaries in Vienna.

Schmelzer is historically significant in two areas: as the major Austrian composer of instrumental music before Biber he influenced the development of the suite as well as the sonata in Austria and south Germany; and his appointment as the first Austrian Kapellmeister at the Habsburg court in the 17th century initiated the ever increasing reliance on native rather than imported talent that was most evident in the first half of the 18th century.

Schmezer [Schmetzer], Georg (b Augsburg, 21 March 1642; d Augsburg, July 1697). German composer and writer on music. He received his musical education at the Gymnasium and at the choir school of St Anna, Augsburg, where Jakob Scheiffelhut and Daniel Merck were among his fellow students. After study trips which took him as far as Stockholm he became Kantor and director of music at St Anna (which was the main Protestant church at Augsburg) in 1677 and remained there until his death. In 1690, on the occasion of Joseph I's coronation in Augsburg, he presented a composition to Joseph's father, the Emperor Leopold I. He was a generally respected and proficient musician. Some of his output resulted from his educational work. For example, the school dramas for which he composed music were performed by the pupils at St Anna, and it was no doubt for them that he wrote his two elementary theoretical works: indeed he intended his Compendium musicae (1688) as a replacement for Adam Gumpelzhaimer's work of the same name that had been used at St Anna since it was published in 1591.

Schmid, Adolf. See MÜLLER, ADOLF.

Schmid, Anton (b Pihl, nr Česká Lípa, Bohemia, 30 Jan 1787; d Salzburg, 3 July 1857). Austrian writer on music. He was the son of Count Kinsky's brewer, Andreas Schmid, and his wife, Theresia Bergmann. After his initial instruction in singing and the piano, he received further musical education after 1798 as a singer in the monastery of the Calced Augustinians in Česká Lípa. From 1804 he lived as a theatre musician and music teacher in Prague, where he also began his literary activity. In 1812 he settled as a private teacher in Vienna. He became a drafting probationer for the Viennese court library in 1818, and was made a Skriptor in 1819 and a Kustos in 1844. At the request of Moritz, Count Dietrichstein, he organized the collection which became the basis for the Österreichische Nationalbibliothek, and was its first keeper; his handwritten catalogue is still in existence. From this task arose not only his fundamental studies on the history of printing music from movable type, but also his more than 500 supplements and reports appended to C.F. Becker's Systematisch-chronologische Darstellung der musikalischen Literatur from 1839, as well as his 'Beiträge zur Literatur und Geschichte der Tonkunst' which appeared in the Mainz journal Caecilia from 1842 to 1848. His other writings on music are concerned with Gluck and with the problems of 18th-century Viennese music history; they appeared in various journals. He also published a bibliography of chess in 1847.

OTHMAR WESSELY

Schmid [Schmidt], Balthasar (b Nuremberg, bap. 20 April 1705; bur. 27 Nov 1749). German music printer, publisher and composer. He served his apprenticeship as a music engraver in Nuremberg, where he is mentioned as such in church records in 1726. He is almost certainly the same Balthasar Schmid who enrolled in Leipzig University on 13 March 1726, for he appears as engraver of the musical text of J.S. Bach's keyboard Partitas nos.1 (1726) and 2 (1727). This is supported by Ernst Ludwig Gerber's attribution of the success of these works to Schmid's engraving. While in Leipzig Schmid honed his engraving skills as journeyman and may have studied with Bach. From the first documented publication of one of his works, on 7 August 1729, Schmid engraved, printed and published a work of his almost yearly for the next decade. In 1734 he engraved the title-page of Bach's Clavier-Übung II. After he was articled as a publisher in 1738 Schmid began to bring out the works of other composers until 1748, when his health seems to have failed. He was renowned as a music engraver of consummate skill throughout Germany. Among the more important composers whose works issued from his press during this time are J.S. Bach (part of Clavier-Übung III, Clavier-Übung IV, canonic variations on Vom Himmel hoch), G.A. Sorge (organ sonatas, preludes and suites for keyboard) and G.P. Telemann (sacred vocal works, portrait, autobiography). Schmid was important in promoting the works of the younger generation of German composers, most notably those from J.S. Bach's circle, including C.P.E. Bach ('Prussian' sonatas, keyboard concertos, trio sonatas, a sinfonia), J.L. Krebs (sonatas for violin and obbligato keyboard, miscellaneous keyboard works), Christoph Nichelmann (12 keyboard sonatas) and F.W. Marpurg (six keyboard sonatas).

Schmid served as organist at various churches in Nuremberg and his compositions are primarily for keyboard. They reflect his concern to capture the market for the growing society of amateurs. His keyboard style derives from patterned diatonic melodies supported by relatively simple chord patterns in the bass, and most works are marked by the form and title of a binary dance movement, traits typical of most keyboard music of the period. He was important in promoting the keyboard sonata with the accompaniment of solo flute or violin in which the accompanying instrument could be omitted, allowing for solo keyboard performance. Two of his minuets appear in Leopold Mozart's Notenbuch for Wolfgang (in fact a forgery). A set of XII Murki apparently were so named because of the alternating octave bass in the left hand, an accompaniment pattern common to a rustic dance then in vogue (see MURKY). Schmid's only venture as composer into the field of vocal music is his Nürnbergische alte und neue Kirchen-Lieder (1748), a collection of 208 chorale melodies set in an open two-part texture with figured bass.

After Schmid's death in November 1749 his widow, Maria Helena Volland (1710–91), carried on the firm's business and it was subsequently taken over by their son Johann Michael (1741–93). He was most active in the realm of vocal music and published many significant lieder collections between 1773 and 1791. His only known compositions are for voice and keyboard. He also brought out a second edition of Balthasar's Kirchen-Lieder in 1773 to which he added 26 chorale tunes for voice and figured bass.

DOUGLAS A. LEE, GREGORY BUTLER

Schmid [Schmidt, Schmitt, Fabricius], Bernhard (i) (b ?Strasbourg, 1535; d Strasbourg, 1592). Alsatian organist and arranger. His father, also named Bernhard, came from either Maursmünster or Lochweiler and served as administrator for various church and educational institutions; his mother, Prisca Wolfenkinder, held Strasbourg citizenship. Apparently Schmid received his musical training in Strasbourg and married Catharina Klein on 31 October 1552. (Their son BERNHARD SCHMID (ii) was born in 1567.) Schmid was appointed organist in 1562 both of the Thomaskirche and of Strasbourg Cathedral, where he played for Christmas services. In 1578, along with two other organists, he inspected the organ in Ulm Cathedral. Except for this visit and a journey during his youth, Schmid apparently lived his entire life in Strasbourg. He relinquished his cathedral post in 1592, accepted one at Jung St Petrus Kirche, and died before the end of the year. A poem by Schmid, describing a festival shooting contest on 15 May 1590, survives. He may also be the author of an epic poem about Petrus von Stauffenberg.

Schmid's Zwey Bücher einer neuen kunstlichen Tabulatur ... allen Organisten und angehenden Instrumentisten zu nutz was published in Strasbourg in 1577 (ed. in EDM, 1st ser. xcvii–xcviii, 1997). It employs new German organ tablature notation, and includes keyboard settings of 20 Latin motets (18 by Lassus, one by Crecquillon and one by Richafort) and 28 sacred and secular song arrangements of works by Lassus, Crecquillon, Zirler, Rogier Pathie, Clemens non Papa, Arcadelt, Berchem, Ferrabosco, Godard, Rore and Meiland. The anthology concludes with five passamezzo–saltarello sets and 13 other dances, several in pairs. Typical keyboard ornamentation (coloration) occurs in all the vocal settings and the voice lines have been adapted for the keyboard. As the full title indicates, Schmid intended his book for all kinds of keyboard instruments. The book serves as an index of the type of keyboard music performed at that time in church and in the home. The ornamentation employed reflects current taste, and is at the root of German Baroque keyboard idioms.

CLYDE WILLIAM YOUNG

Schmid, Bernhard (ii) (b Strasbourg, bap. 1 April 1567; d ?Strasbourg, before 5 Nov 1625). Alsatian organist and arranger. He was the son of Bernhard Schmid (i), and probably attended local schools, receiving his musical training from his father. In 1584 he played the vesper service at St Niklaus in Undis (now St Nicolas). From 1589 to 1592 he served as organist at the Thomaskirche, a post held previously by his father. He married first Barbara Stumpff, daughter of the verger of the Thomaskirche on 28 July 1590; and second Maria Mers, a widow, on 24 November 1611. He succeeded his father as organist at Strasbourg Cathedral on 1 April 1592, though he also served as organist and custodian at the Predigerkirche for some time. Like his father he acted as an organ consultant. From 1614 he served as a city councillor. His coat of arms bore the motto:

> Qui non amat musicam
> Plag S. Veitstanz et Podagram.

A new cathedral organist was appointed on 5 November 1625 to replace Schmid.

Schmid's Tabulatur Buch (Strasbourg, 1607/R), in new German tablature, opens with 22 intonations by G. Gabrieli and eight by A. Gabrieli. The following six toccatas come from the works of the two Gabrielis, Diruta and Merulo. For his motet intabulations Schmid chose pieces by Hassler, Massaino, Tresti, Erbach, Bianciardi, Morello, Aichinger, Sambucci, Bonhomio and Weissensee. There follow 16 Italian secular songs, by Hassler, Giovanelli, Quagliati, Soriano, G. Gabrieli, Pozzo, Rore, Marenzio, Orlandini, Orazio Vecchi and Striggio; all the vocal prototypes were 'colored' in the German tradition of the time. Twelve canzoni alla francese or Fugen by Italians (Malvezzi, Maschera, G. Gabrieli, Mortaro, Bianchieri, Soriano, Brignoli and Orfeo Vecchi) also indicate the addition of keyboard ornamentation. Two passamezzo–saltarello sets and 12 galliards end the collection.

In the full title Schmid indicated that he had adapted and ornamented the music he included, and in the foreword he stated that the work was intended not for experienced keyboard players but for his own students and other novices. He wrote that rather than reprint his father's book he had decided to produce something new and appropriate to the time. Indeed, this collection shows the strong influence of Italian composers on German music in the early 17th century. Though the German ornamentation which Schmid executed brilliantly remains, the appearance of original keyboard compositions, not based on vocal models, marks an important step in the development of instrumental music. One madrigal intabulation and two motet intabulations appear in Cantantibus organis, vi, vii, xii, ed. E. Kraus (Regensburg, 1961–3).

CLYDE WILLIAM YOUNG

Schmid, Erich (b Balsthal, canton of Solothurn, 1 Jan 1907). Swiss conductor and composer. He studied theory and composition with Bernhard Sekles at the Hoch Konservatorium, Frankfurt (1927–30), and in 1928 was awarded the Frankfurt Mozart Prize for composition. After further studies with Schoenberg at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik (1930–31), he worked for three years with SWF at Baden-Baden. He then returned to Switzerland and settled in Glarus, where he was music director until 1949, when he succeeded Andreae as chief conductor of the Tonhalle Orchestra and the Gemischter Chor at Zürich. In 1957 he became principal conductor of the Beromünster RO, and in 1963 director of the Zürich Männerchor and the conducting classes at the Basle Musikakademie. He has toured elsewhere in Europe, and appeared frequently in London from the 1960s, especially as a conductor of BBC concerts. He was principal guest conductor of the CBSO from 1979 to 1982. A staunch champion of contemporary music, he was for many years president of the Zürich branch of the ISCM, and published studies of Schoenberg's quartets (SMz, lxxiv, 1934, pp.1–7, 84–91, 155–63). His own compositions use a post-Schoenberg idiom and mainly comprise chamber and piano music, songs (including Rilke-Suite and Michelangelo-Gesänge), unaccompanied choruses and an orchestral arrangement of Debussy's Six épigraphes antiques.

FRITZ MUGGLER

Schmid, Ernst Fritz (b Tübingen, 7 March 1904; d Augsburg, 20 Jan 1960). German musicologist. He studied the violin and the viola at the Munich Academy (1924–7). He also studied music theory and orchestral conducting privately, and musicology with Sandberger at Munich University and later at Freiburg with Gurlitt (1927–9), Tübingen (with Karl Hasse) and Vienna (with Fischer, Haas, Orel and Lach), taking the doctorate at Tübingen in 1929. After freelancing as a conductor and musicologist in Vienna, he completed the Habilitation in 1934 as an external lecturer at Graz University with a book on the background to Haydn. In 1935 he was appointed professor at Tübingen University, where he also founded the Schwäbisches Landesmusikarchiv.

In 1937 he moved to Mainfranken and undertook research trips on behalf of the Haydn scholar Anthony van Hoboken; he was also commissioned by the city of Augsburg to investigate its music history. After war service he moved to Augsburg as a music critic. There he founded the Mozartgemeinde (1948) and the Deutsche Mozartgesellschaft (1951), of which he was president until 1957. In 1954 he was appointed general editor of the new collected edition of Mozart's works.

His particular interests were Mozart's Swabian forerunners and the stylistic connections between Viennese Baroque and Classical music (with special reference to Gottfried van Swieten). His Haydn studies were the result of thorough archival research; he also undertook research on Haydn's predecessor at Eisenstadt, G.J. Werner. His greatest discovery (1933) was of the private music collection of Emperor Franz II in Graz, a library of 10,000 publications and manuscripts from 18th- and early 19th-century Vienna (now in A-Wn). His son, MANFRED HERMANN SCHMID is also a musicologist.

RUDOLF KLEIN

Schmid [Schmidt], Ferdinand (b 1693/4; d Vienna, 10/11 Aug 1756). Austrian composer. After his musical training, probably in Vienna, he became regens chori at the church of St Dorothea, probably as successor to Mathias Timmer, and then at the Augustinerkirche. He was also appointed in 1743 Kapellmeister at the shrine of Maria Pötsch in the Stephansdom (maestro di cappella della madonna di S Steffano, or second maestro di cappella). Reutter, the first cathedral maestro, wanted to thwart his nomination to this post, but Schmid was nevertheless appointed since the city felt indebted to his family (in 1724 his father-in-law had donated a new organ to the cathedral). As a composer of church music Schmid was not only diligent but also most successful. Innumerable minor sacred works are to be found in the archives of Austrian monasteries and are known to have been performed frequently well into the second half of the 18th century. His church music varies a great deal in style. His large-scale masses, sometimes divided into as many as 15 or more movements, make resourceful use of the orchestra and often make taxing demands on the vocal soloists. Like many other Austrian composers of church music at the time, he showed an interest in unifying Credo movements by repeating a motif or paragraph of music first associated with the word 'credo' at later stages in the movement. The fact that he developed many of his melodies in the manner of folk music may have been one reason why Schmid's works so long enjoyed popularity in most parts of Austria. Despite his industry as composer, teacher and Kapellmeister, he died in poverty.

EVA BADURA-SKODA/DAVID WYN JONES

Schmid, Heinrich Kaspar (b Landau, 11 Sept 1874; d Geiselbullach, nr Munich, 8 Jan 1953). German composer. He received his earliest musical training from his father, a school teacher and choral conductor, and spent several years as a choirboy at Regensburg Cathedral. He later studied at the Munich Akademie der Tonkunst, where his teachers included Ludwig Thuille. He was appointed to teach at the Munich Academy in 1905 and was promoted to professor in 1919. After World War I, he enjoyed success as both a composer and performer, touring Austria, Scandinavia and Russia. He became director of the Karlsruhe Conservatory in 1921 and assumed the directorship of the Augsburg Music School [now Conservatory] in 1924. He retired from academic life in 1932.

As a composer Schmid remained loyal to the style of the late-Romantics, particularly Brahms, whose influence is evident in the sonatas for violin and piano (1920, 1939). The Symphony in D Minor (1947) was recognized for its fresh and accomplished treatment of traditional musical materials. Elements of Bavarian folk music appear in the rural mass settings, choral compositions, lieder and chamber works.

ANDREW D. McCREDIE

Schmid [Schmidt], Johann Michael (b Pernartitz [now Bernartice], Bohemia, *c*1720; d Mainz, 19 Dec 1792). German composer. From 1736 to 1740 he was a musician at the Kleinheubach court of Prince Löwenstein-Wertheim-Rosenberg. From 1742 he served as valet and from 1745 as director of the court orchestra for the Prince-Bishop of Augsburg. On 1 April 1756 he succeeded his countryman Zach as court Kapellmeister in Mainz. He gave up this post to Righini in 1787 but remained at full salary, obliged only to take part occasionally in performances of the court orchestra. Haydn and Leopold Mozart were both acquainted with him.

According to contemporary accounts Schmid was an active composer, but few of his works are extant. Two symphonies survive (in D-HR), but his output seems to have centred on church music: a mass and nine smaller pieces (all in MZsch) show him to have been a skilful composer of average talent whose style developed from post-Baroque to early Classical. These works show a fluent and sometimes even dashing melodic invention which goes beyond the usual method at that time of composing on small motifs. He seems to have given up composition by 1780. His other works, now lost, included a melodrama Regina Saba Salomonis hospita (1753) and the oratorios Tod und Begräbnis Jesu (1761), Die Abnehmung Jesu Christi vom Kreuz (1766), Gephte (1767, 1768), Die heilige Helena auf dem Calvari Berg (1769, 1772) and Das Leiden Jesu Christi (1775, 1777).

HUBERT UNVERRICHT

Schmid, Manfred Hermann (b Ottobeuren, 10 Aug 1947). German musicologist, son of the musicologist ERNST FRITZ SCHMID. Born to a musical family (he is also related to the composers Emil Kauffman and Ernst Friedrich Kauffman) he studied the violin with Koeckert at Augsburg Conservatory, musicology with Croll and Georgiades at Salzburg and Munich universities respectively, and music theory with Peter Förtig at the Freiburg Musikhochschule. He took the doctorate in Munich in 1975 with a dissertation on Mozart and the Salzburg musical tradition. After a period as assistant lecturer at Munich University, he became curator of the instrument collection of the Munich Stadtmuseum in 1979. He completed the Habilitation in 1980 at Munich University with an investigation of works by Weber, Schumann and Wagner. He was appointed professor of musicology at Tübingen University in 1986. He is chairman of the Musikhistorische Kommission of Das Erbe deutscher Musik and the Deutsches musikgeschichtliches Archiv, Kassel, and is a member of the advisory committee for the Gesellschaft für Musikgeschichte in Baden-Württemberg; he is also founder and editor of the journal Mozart Studien and editor of the series Tübinger Beiträge zur Musikwissenschaft and Denkmäler der Musik in Baden-Württemberg. His research focusses on the music of Viennese Classical composers, particularly Mozart, for which he created a special forum of discussion with the journal Mozart Studien. His other area of expertise is organology, a subject which combines his experience as a scholar and a curator.

LORENZ WELKER

Schmidl, Carlo (b Trieste, 7 Oct 1859; d Trieste, 7 Oct 1943). Italian music publisher and writer on music. After beginning to study the violin with his father, an orchestral conductor, he joined the Trieste music publishing firm Vicentini (1872–89) and then founded his own firm (Carlo Schmidl & Co.), which absorbed Vicentini in the following year and was bought by Ricordi in 1902; Schmidl continued to run the Leipzig branch of Ricordi that he had established (1901–6). His firm published a considerable amount of early and contemporary Italian music, including that of Smareglia, Respighi and Busoni, and organized chamber concerts and celebrity recitals (with performances by Ysaÿe, Sarasate and Busoni). Besides two biographies (Robert Schumann: la sua vita e le sue opere … con un'appendice di Clara Schumann, Bologna, 1889; G.S. Mayr: Cenni biografici su Mayr e l'importanza della sua opera Ginevra di Scozia, Trieste, 1901), he wrote the Dizionario universale dei musicisti (Milan, 1887–90, 2/1928–9; suppl. 1938, 3/1938), which remains the best general biographical source for Italian musicians. It gives lists of works (including republications) and dates of first performances, and has particularly valuable articles on Italian literary figures and their relationship to music. Schmidl's collection of music manuscripts and rare editions passed to the Trieste Verdi Museum, which he organized from 1922 to his death (see G. Cesari: Cent'anni di vita di uno stabilimento musicale triestino: le origini dello stabilimento Carlo Schmidl e Co., Trieste, 1913).

TERESA M. GIALDRONI

Schmidlin [Schmidli], Johannes (b Zürich, 22 May 1722; d Wetzikon, 5 Nov 1772). Swiss composer. He trained as a Protestant minister at the Collegium Carolinum in Zürich, where he was a member of the collegium musicum from 1734 and probably studied music under J.C. Bachofen. After being ordained in 1743 he was curate in Dietlikon (1744–54) and minister in Wetzikon-Seegräben (1754–72). In 1755 he founded a choral society in Wetzikon to promote the singing of psalms in church which continued until 1825. In 1769 he also established a collegium musicum there. His numerous collections of Pietistic songs, cantatas and odes were a rich source of vocal music for many decades and were sung in both collegia and private homes throughout German-speaking Switzerland. Schmidlin also made an important contribution to the development of the solo song, particularly in the patriotic Schweizerlieder of 1769. These songs with figured bass show influences of the Berlin lied school in their conscious striving for simplicity, although tempered by an indifferent talent. Three of his sacred songs are in the present hymnbook of the Evangelical Reformed Church in Switzerland.

JÜRG STENZL

Schmidt, Andreas (b Düsseldorf, 30 July 1960). German baritone. He studied in his home city with Ingeborg Reichelt and in Berlin with Fischer-Dieskau, and sang with the chorus of the Düsseldorf Musikverein, of which his father, Hartmut Schmidt, was conductor. Having won first prize in the Deutscher Musikwettbewerb in 1983, he made his operatic début the following year (as Malatesta in Don Pasquale) at the Deutsche Oper, Berlin, where he subsequently took part in the premières of Rihm's Oedipus (1987) and Henze's Das verratene Meer (1990). An early international appearance was at Covent Garden, as Valentin in 1986; others have been at Aix-en-Provence, Glyndebourne and the Metropolitan, in the Mozart roles – Count Almaviva, Guglielmo, Papageno – in which his cultivated, gently rounded voice production, sensitivity to verbal nuance and quietly distinguished stage presence prove particularly appreciable. Schmidt is also a skilful, sympathetic lieder and oratorio singer, as revealed in recordings ranging from Bach cantatas to Wolf's Italienisches Liederbuch.

MAX LOPPERT

Schmidt, Arthur P(aul) (b Altona, 1 April 1846; d Boston, 5 May 1921). American music publisher of German birth. He emigrated to the USA in January 1866 and worked in Boston for the G.D. Russell & Co. publishing house until October 1876 when he established his own firm. In 1880 he issued, with Cranz of Hamburg, J.K. Paine's Spring Symphony, and in 1888 published G.W. Chadwick's Symphony no.2, op.21, the first orchestral score by an American composer to be issued by an American publisher. He brought out works by many New England composers including Amy Beach, Arthur Bird, Chadwick, Henry Hadley, Paine and Horatio Parker, as well as almost the entire body of compositions by Arthur Foote and Edward MacDowell.

In 1889 Schmidt engaged the Kistner firm as his Leipzig agent; this arrangement lasted until 1908, when he established his own branch in Leipzig. In 1910 B. Schott's Söhne bought the European rights to the Schmidt catalogue; the firm's Leipzig interests continued to be represented by an agent until 1938. The Boston list had over 15,000 titles, and the Leipzig list over 500. Although the bulk of Schmidt's publications were in small forms – for piano, voice, chorus, and small ensembles – it is the large orchestral works by American composers, some of which were first published in Leipzig, that brought him recognition. Schmidt had a branch in New York from 1894 to 1937, and published a journal, the Musical World (1901–4).

Educational music became the major focus of the firm after Schmidt's retirement in 1916, when three long-time employees, H.B. Crosby, F.J. Emery and H.R. Austin, became partners in the firm. Austin became president in 1949, and sold it to Summy-Birchard in 1959. A vast collection of the firm's archival records, together with correspondence with composers, and autograph manuscripts used for published editions, is in the Library of Congress.

Schmidt, Christfried (b Markersdorf, Upper Lusatia, 26 Nov 1932). German composer. He attended the college of church music in Görlitz (1951–4) and the Leipzig Muiskhochschule (graduated 1959), where his teachers included Werner Buschnakowski (organ) and Johannes Weyrauch (composition). After performing as a church musician in Forst, Lusatia (1960–62), he served for a short time as a theatrical music director in Quedlinburg. From 1964 he worked as a freelance composer, piano teacher and choral conductor. He relocated to Berlin in 1980. His honours include composition prizes from Nuremberg (1971, 1976), Szczecin (1973), Trieste (1974) and Boswil (1978), the art prize of the German Democratic Republic (1987) and the Stamitz Prize (1991). He was inducted into the Academy of Arts (East) in 1990–91.

Schmidt's early works include over 100 songs. Among his first instrumental compositions were a string quartet (1965) and the first and second symphonies (1967, 1968). Early in the 1970s three of his works received Tokyo premières. Only after the 1983 performance of his Munch-Musik (1980), however, did he begin to receive wider recognition in the German Democratic Republic. His musical style often employs strict compositional structures that both create an 'intellectual and sensual fascination with sound' and convey idealistic messages. He has described himself as an 'expressive musician' who aims to shake his audiences, strike a thoughtful note, arouse enthusiasm or perplexity and 'affect sensitive souls'. (KdG, B. Schröder-Nauenburg)

BEATE SCHRÖDER-NAUENBURG

Schmidt, Christian Martin (b Dessau, 11 Oct 1942). German musicologist. He studied music at the University of Hamburg (1963–4), the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris (1964–5) and the University of Göttingen (1965–7) and took the doctorate in musicology at the Freie Universität in Berlin in 1970 with an analysis of motivic-thematic structures in Brahms's music. That same year he joined the editorial staff of the Schoenberg collected edition and in 1985 he completed the Habilitation at the Freie Universität with a study on Schoenberg's Moses und Aron. Both postgraduate degrees were supervised by Rudolf Stephan. In 1987 he was appointed professor at the University of Amsterdam, and in 1991 he became professor at the Technische Universität in Berlin, succeeding Carl Dahlhaus; he is also academic adviser for the Mendelssohn collected edition based in Leipzig.

Schmidt is known primarily for his work on Brahms and Schoenberg: in addition to editing volumes of music by both composers, he has written introductory books on Brahms and many important articles analysing Brahms's and Schoenberg's works. Schmidt has also written about editorial techniques, music history and aesthetics; however, the focus of his writings is the study of structure in works by a broad range of composers, including Bach, Reger and late 20th-century composers such as Zimmerman, Ligeti, Stockhausen and Isang Yun. In his discussions Schmidt seeks to challenge traditional approaches in music theory by examining works according to aspects such as timbre, temporal types (Zeitarten) and spatial relationships.

J. BRADFORD ROBINSON

Schmidt, Ferdinand. See SCHMID, FERDINAND.

Schmidt, Franz (b Pressburg [now Bratislava], 22 Dec 1874; d Perchtoldsdorf, nr Vienna, 11 Feb 1939). Austrian composer, pianist, cellist and conductor. He was from a German Hungarian-speaking family. In Pressburg he learnt the piano from his mother, Rudolf Mader and Ludwig Burger, and the organ and music theory from Father Felizian Josef Moczik, a Franciscan. He first performed as an infant prodigy on the piano at the Palais Grassalkovich and elsewhere, and continued his studies with Leschetitzky. In 1888 he moved to Vienna, and in 1890 began attending the conservatory of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, where he studied theory with Fuchs (when Bruckner retired from teaching), and the cello with Karl Udel and Ferdinand Hellmesberger. From 1896 to 1911 he was a cellist in the Vienna PO, playing also in the orchestra of the Hofoper from 1896 until 1914. In 1901 he began teaching at the conservatory (cello from 1901, piano from 1914, and counterpoint and composition from 1922). After it had been renamed the Hochschule, Schmidt served as both its director (1925–7) and its rector (1927–31). His most famous pupils included Friedrich Wührer, Theodor Berger, Marcel Rubin and Alfred Uhl. He was meanwhile responsible for the affiliation of Max Reinhardt's drama seminar to the Musikhochschule as well as fundamental reforms in administration and the system of teaching. As a soloist and chamber musician Schmidt was among the most highly regarded cellists and pianists of his time, performing with, among others the Vienna PO and the Rosé Quartet. He was also a respected conductor. His friends included Schreker and Marx, while Krenek, Berg and Schoenberg admired him, the latter especially for an exemplary interpretation of Schoenberg's Pierrot lunaire which Schmidt gave with his students. His many honours bear witness to his illustrious status in Austrian musical life in the 1920s and 30s: they include the Franz Josef Order, honorary membership of the Vienna Philharmonic, an honorary doctorate of the University of Vienna (an honour previously given to Bruckner and Marx), the title of Hofrat, and the Beethoven Prize of the Prussian Academy, Berlin. His private life however presents a darker picture: his father's financial irregularities, which forced the family to move from Pressburg to Vienna; the mental illness of his first wife Karoline (murdered in 1942 as part of the Nazi euthanasia operation) and the death of his first child Emma shortly after her birth. Research into his life and work and the performance of his compositions has been encouraged since 1951 by the Franz-Schmidt-Gesellschaft, founded in Vienna, with its headquarters in the Musikverein.

The composer destroyed a large part of his juvenilia. Only two piano sonatas (in E major and B major) have survived, along with four Kleine Fantasiestücke für Violoncell und Klavier nach ungarischen Nationalmelodien (three of which are published). The latter, dating from 1892, display an important feature of his work, namely the Hungarian influence, which remains prominent even in his penultimate composition, the Quintet in A major of 1938. He absorbed all the important elements of the Hungarian idiom to the point that it became a constant part of his personal style. It is also evident in the first, second and fourth symphonies, in the quintets, in the Variationen über ein Husarenlied and most notably in his first opera Notre Dame, where it is used to characterize the gypsy Esmeralda: Karl Goldmark described the famous Intermezzo as 'the most beautiful of gypsy music'. Even Schmidt's best known and most frequently performed major work, the oratorio Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln, contains an 'ungarische Hallelujah'. Beside this large-scale work based on the Apocalypse, his works include the highly expressive quartets (the second providing evidence of his involvement with the avant garde of the time) and three quintets, as well as two piano concertos and a toccata for left hand alone, works commissioned by Paul Wittgenstein but published in two-hand arrangements by Friedrich Wührer. (Wittgenstein apparently thought better of Schmidt's creations than of the works written for him by more prominent composers.) Schmidt cannot be placed conclusively in any of the categories of symphonists sketched by Paul Bekker in Die Sinfonie von Beethoven bis Mahler (Berlin, 1918). His symphonies provide a synthesis, a summation of the various Austro-German manifestations of the genre, suggesting the culmination of the Classical and Romantic tradition; they display monumentality alongside lyricism and restraint, with close relationships between the thematic and motivic material of individual movements. They also make prominent use of variation form, fugato passages, and chorale sections. Powerful climaxes are often in evidence as is strong rhythmic impulse in the scherzo movements. The Fourth Symphony, a Requiem für meine Tochter conceived as an integrated whole with a funeral march at its centre, is particularly original. Schmidt's only failure was with his second opera Fredigundis (first performed in Berlin in 1922). While his chamber music belongs essentially in the Austro-German tradition of Brahms and Reger (despite his interest in Schoenberg, Debussy and Hindemith), his fine compositions for organ point to his intense involvement since early childhood with J.S. Bach, of whose works he was also an excellent interpreter on the piano. Schmidt cogently expressed his well-founded opposition to the idea of the 'orchestral organ': instead he sought clarity with the aid of logical polyphony, relatively strict counterpoint linked to late Romantic harmonies and traditional formal principles (the fugue, variations, chorale themes, the toccata, chaconne and prelude). These features connect him with Reger, and are responsible for making his organ works gradually better known, along with the Buch mit sieben Siegeln and his orchestral and chamber music compositions.

CARMEN OTTNER

Schmidt, Giovanni (Federico) (b Livorno, *c*1775; d Naples, after 1839). Italian librettist. Schmidt settled early in Naples, remaining there for the rest of his life. Between 1800 and 1840 he wrote some 45 librettos, nearly all of them for the S Carlo, where he was employed as a poet. With Tottola, he dominated the writing of librettos in Naples in the first quarter of the 19th century, for which he has received a deservedly bad press; his librettos were prolix, pedestrian and cliché-ridden. He is best remembered for his four librettos for Rossini, Elisabetta regina d'Inghilterra, Eduardo e Cristina, Armida and Adelaide di Borgogna (the first two of which had previously been set by Pavesi), and as a translator, notably of Spontini's La vestale.

JOHN BLACK

Schmidt, Gustav (b Weimar, 1 Sept 1816; d Darmstadt, 11 Feb 1882). German conductor and composer. He studied in Weimar under Hummel, Eberwein and Lobe, and in Leipzig with Mendelssohn. He conducted at the theatre in Brünn (now Brno) from 1841 to 1844, then in Würzburg (1845), Frankfurt (1846), Wiesbaden (1849), Frankfurt (1851–61), Leipzig (1864–76) and Mainz. He finally became court Kapellmeister in Darmstadt in 1876. His operas, for some of which he wrote his own texts, include the successful Prinz Eugen (performed in Frankfurt, 1847), Die Weiber von Weinsberg (Frankfurt, 1858), and the less popular La Réole (Breslau, 1863) and Alibi (Darmstadt, 1880). Much admired as a conductor, he was an early champion of Wagner and introduced Tannhäuser and Lohengrin to Frankfurt; he also sought to make Berlioz's music better known in Germany. Liszt, who conducted Die Weiber von Weinsberg in Weimar, took an interest in his plan for a conference of Kapellmeisters to increase their artistic standing in music and at the same time their musical standards. Schmidt also wrote popular songs and choruses.

JOHN WARRACK

Schmidt, Harvey (Lester) (b Dallas, 12 Sept 1929). American composer. He studied art at the University of Texas (BA 1952), where his fellow student Tom Jones (b Littlefield, TX, 17 Feb 1928) aroused his interest in the musical theatre. The two collaborated on some college shows, Schmidt (who learned to play piano by ear) providing the music and Jones writing the sketches. After serving in the US Army Schmidt obtained work in New York as a commerical artist, but continued to produce revue songs in partnership with Jones. In 1959 they wrote a one-act show for the summer theatre at Barnard College and, encouraged by its success, expanded it the following year to a full-length musical. Although The Fantasticks did not find great favour with the critics at first, it received the Vernon Price Award as the outstanding off-Broadway production of the season. It also proved exceedingly popular with the public and became one of the longest-running American musicals. Schmidt's success continued with 110 in the Shade (1963), the first Broadway musical requiring only two characters, I Do! I Do! (1966) and Celebration, which achieved only a short run. In order to provide a forum for small experimental musicals Schmidt and Jones then opened the Portfolio Studio on West 47th Street. They presented four works during the 1974–5 season, of which Philemon was the best received. Schmidt and Jones also wrote the musicals Colette (1970, revised 1982 and 1983), and Grovers Corners (1987), but have never repeated their earlier successes.

Schmidt, Joducus [Josquin]. See FABRI, JODUCUS.

Schmidt, Johann Christoph (i) (b Hohnstein, nr Pirna, 6 Aug 1664; d Dresden, 13 April 1728). German composer. Son of the Hohnstein Kantor Johann Christian Schmidt (d 1690), he became a chorister in 1676 at the court chapel in Dresden where, at the request of the elector Johann Georg III, he was taught by Christoph Bernhard. He later became an instrumentalist in the court orchestra. In 1687 he was appointed master of the choristers and in 1692 second organist. He went to study in Italy in 1694, with support from the elector, and in 1696, on the recommendation of N.A. Strungk, the Dresden court Kapellmeister, became his deputy Kapellmeister and chamber organist. Soon after, Strungk left for Leipzig and Schmidt was appointed principal Kapellmeister on 19 June 1698. During the rule of August the Strong (1694–1733) the court Kapelle served both as the Saxon electoral and Polish royal orchestra, and had extensive duties in Dresden, Kraków and Warsaw; Schmidt was its director and as Kapellmeister also had responsibility for the Protestant church music at court. In addition, he was director of the Catholic church music until 1717, when he gave that task to J.D. Heinichen. During Schmidt's term as director the Dresden orchestra became one of the most renowned in Europe owing to its many distinguished players, who around 1719 included J.B. Volumier, J.G. Pisendel, F.M. Veracini, Christoph Pezold, Pantaleon Hebenstreit, S.L. Weiss, J.D. Zelenka, P.G. Buffardin and J.C. Richter.

In 1719 Schmidt, who had been made Oberkapellmeister in 1717, wrote a French divertissement Les quatre saisons in a sequence of recitatives, arias, concerted numbers and choruses, suited to the talents of the dilettantes who performed it on 23 September as part of a Festival of Venus on the marriage of Prince Friedrich August of Saxony to the Archduchess Maria Josepha of Austria. This work, the central event in a typical Dresden court festival of August the Strong's reign, followed the tradition of the 17th-century opéra-ballet. Schmidt was noted by Hiller as a solid composer with a good grasp of counterpoint; but although he lacked exceptional artistic gifts he was not a 'dry' or 'infertile' composer, as Hiller wrote. J.S. Bach copied out his motet Auf Gott hoffe ich. He ranks as a minor master of his time, clearly handling the musical resources and stylistic conventions of Dresden high Baroque with competence. From 1717 Schmidt and Heinichen ranked equally as Kapellmeisters of church and chamber music respectively, and divided the orchestral work between them; after Schmidt's death Heinichen took over the Protestant church music at the court. Mattheson printed a letter from Schmidt, dated 28 July 1718, in his Critica musica (vii, 1722, p.266), dealing with solmization. Schmidt acted as intermediary in the controversy over the old method, suggesting that solmization should be retained for vocal music but advocating the use of the two 'French modes, major and minor' for the 'stylo moderno'. His pupils included C.G. Schröter, C.H. Graun and Melchior Hofmann.

His brother Johann Wolfgang Schmidt (b Hohnstein, 20 Nov 1677; d Dresden, 5 April 1744) served as copyist at the Dresden court from 1709 and was organist for the Protestant church music there from 1719.

Schmidt, Johann Michael (i) (b Meiningen, 16 Jan 1728; d Marktbreit, Lower Franconia, 8 April 1799). German theologian and writer on music. From 1749 he attended Leipzig University and probably studied music with J.S. Bach. About 1754 he was in Naumburg, and in 1762 he was made rector of the Lateinschule in Marktbreit where in 1788 he became deputy pastor and assessor of the prince's consistory. He published a widely acclaimed Musico-theologia, oder Erbauliche Anwendung musicalischer Wahrheiten (Bayreuth and Hof, 1754), directed against certain Enlightenment doctrines; the work is noteworthy for its date in containing several laudatory references to Bach, and reveals an unusual degree of familiarity with his works. Schmidt has also been suggested as the recipient of Bach's seven-part Faber-Kanon (BWV1078), though Balthasar Schmid is more often proposed for that role.

Schmidt, Johann Philipp Samuel (b Königsberg, 8 Sept 1779; d Berlin, 9 May 1853). German composer. He made some early appearances as a pianist, including in his own works, before studying law in Königsberg. He then travelled extensively in Germany, settling briefly in Berlin (1798–9) as a pupil of J.G. Naumann, and eventually returning to Berlin (1801) to work in a government post. At the same time he wrote songs for the Liedertafel founded there by Zelter and soon resumed his musical career, performing in public and writing essays on music as well as composing operas and other works. His operas and Singspiels, which according to Härtwig display Biedermeier sensibilities, are written in a light and melodically attractive post-Mozartian style. One of the most popular was Das Fischermädchen (1818), which was praised by Weber, among other things for its musical characterization, in an essay written before he conducted the Dresden première in 1818. Schmidt wrote some church music, including two masses, and chamber music, and made many arrangements. He also wrote articles and reviews for various journals, including Caecilia.

JOHN WARRACK/R

Schmidt, Joseph (b Davidende, 4 March 1904; d Gyrembad, nr Zürich, 16 Nov 1942). Romanian tenor. As a boy he sang in the synagogue at Czernowitz (now Chernovtsy, Ukraine), and he remained active as a cantor throughout his professional life. He studied in Vienna, but his future as an operatic tenor was limited by his smallness of stature. Broadcasts and recordings provided the answer: in 1928 he made his radio début in a performance of Idomeneo in Berlin, and he quickly became one of the most popular singers in Germany. He also enjoyed success in films, which led to a first tour of the USA in 1936. Germany became closed to him in 1934 and Austria in 1938; he took refuge in Belgium, then Switzerland, where he died in an internment camp. His many recordings preserve a fine voice, well produced except for a certain nasal quality, with an exceptional upper range and a distinctive personality. (L. di Cave: Mille voci una stella, Rome, 1985, pp.184–5)

J.B. STEANE

Schmidt, Nickel. See FABER, NICOLAUS (i).

Schmidt, Ole (b Copenhagen, 14 July 1928). Danish conductor and composer. He made a living as a jazz pianist before studying the piano and composition at the Royal Danish Conservatory in Copenhagen (beginning in 1948), where his teachers included Niels Viggo Bentzon, Høffding, Jersild and Holmboe. He studied conducting with Albert Wolff, Grevillius, Rafael Kubelík and Celibidache. A conductor at the Royal Danish Ballet in Copenhagen (1958–65), from 1969 to 1970 he was principal conductor of the Hamburg SO. He was then conductor of the Danish Radio Concert Orchestra (1971–3), and principal conductor of the Århus SO (1978–85). From 1986 to 1996 he was permanent guest conductor at the RNCM, Manchester, and from 1990 to 1995 principal guest conductor for the Toledo SO, Ohio. Schmidt was the first conductor to record a complete cycle of the symphonies of Carl Nielsen (1974, with the LSO). His extensive output also includes pioneering recordings of Rued Langgaard's Antikrist and Asger Hamerik's Requiem.

Ole Schmidt's compositions are wide-ranging, and extend to almost every imaginable genre. His stylistic point of departure is neo-classicism, which in postwar Denmark was the strongest trend, and his models have been Bartók, Hindemith and Stravinsky. He is not a dogmatic composer, but marks his music with his vitality, unconventional imagination and high degree of instrumental insight. His works have strong, precise tones, rhythmic vitality and often virtuoso elements.

JENS CORNELIUS

Schmidt, Peter. See FABRICIUS, PETRUS.

Schmidt, Theodor. See SMITH, THEODORE.

Schmidt, Trudeliese (b Saarbrücken, 7 Nov 1934). German mezzo-soprano. She began a commercial career before taking up singing studies with Hans Richrath in Saarbrücken, and later in Rome, and made her stage début at the Saarbrücken Stadttheater in 1965. In 1967 she joined the Deutsche Oper am Rhein, Düsseldorf, where she specialized in trouser roles (Cherubino, Octavian, Siébel, Orlofsky) and played Dorabella and Suzuki, making her British début with that company at the 1972 Edinburgh Festival. She made débuts in 1974 at the Vienna Staatsoper as Octavian and Covent Garden as Cherubino, in 1975 at Bayreuth in the Ring, and in 1976 at Glyndebourne as Dorabella. Schmidt sang the Marchesa Matilda Spina in the première of Manfred Trojahn's Enrico (1991, Schwetzingen). A singing actress of grace and spirit, she has made numerous opera recordings, including roles in Dido and Aeneas, Idomeneo, Mathis der Maler, Der Barbier von Bagdad and The Cunning Little Vixen. She also has a notable career as a concert singer, and has recorded such works as Mozart's Requiem, Mahler's Eighth Symphony and the Bach cantatas.

NOËL GOODWIN

Schmidt-Görg, Joseph (b Rüdinghausen, Kreis Hörde, Westphalia, 19 March 1897; d Bonn, 3 April 1981). German musicologist. He studied musicology at Bonn University with Schiedermair and Anton Schmitz with physics and education as subsidiary subjects, took the doctorate at Bonn in 1926 with a dissertation on the masses of Clemens non Papa and in 1927 became an assistant at the newly established Beethoven Archive in Bonn. He completed the Habilitation in 1930 in musical acoustics at Bonn with a dissertation on mean-tone temperament. He then became a lecturer in acoustics at Bonn University. In 1938 he became a reader, and his lecturing privileges were extended to the entire faculty of musicology; from 1948 until his retirement in 1966 he held a full professorship. He was director of the Beethoven Archive in Bonn (1945–72), and founded and edited the new series of Veröffentlichungen des Beethovenhauses in Bonn (1951) which was responsible for the publications Beethoven: Skizzen und Entwürfe, the Beethoven-Jahrbuch, Beethoven: Ausgewählte Handschriften in Faksimile-Ausgaben and the Schriften zur Beethovenforschung. He was also chief editor of the Beethoven collected edition.

Schmidt-Görg specialized in musical acoustics and the history of music in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, together with Gregorian chant and Byzantine music. Beethoven research formed a central feature of his work: aside from a fleeting interest in Beethoven's racial lineage, his interpretation and cataloguing of source materials made a notable contribution to biographical knowledge, especially of Beethoven's family. His planned collected edition of Beethoven's letters, which he worked on until shortly before his death, was never completed.

HANS HEINRICH EGGEBRECHT/PAMELA M. POTTER

Schmidt-Isserstedt, Hans (b Berlin, 5 May 1900; d Holm-Holstein, nr Hamburg, 28 May 1973). German conductor and composer. He studied in Berlin at the Musikhochschule and at the university where he wrote a dissertation on the Italian influences on instrumentation in Mozart's early operas. After engagements at various German theatres, he was appointed principal Kapellmeister at the Hamburg Staatsoper in 1935, and in 1943 opera director at the Deutsche Oper in Berlin, where he became Generalmusikdirektor in 1944. He acquired a reputation as an exceptional orchestral trainer with the establishment of the radio orchestra in Hamburg (from 1951 the NDR SO), which he directed from its foundation in 1945 until 1971, when he became its honorary conductor. With this orchestra he went to Paris and Edinburgh, the USSR and the USA. He was also principal conductor of the Royal Stockholm PO (1955–64) and he appeared as a guest conductor with more than 120 orchestras in all the principal musical centres. He conducted memorable performances of Le nozze di Figaro at Glyndebourne in 1958, and of Tristan und Isolde at Covent Garden in 1962.

Schmidt-Isserstedt aimed at a transparent orchestral texture and strict rhythmic precision, rejecting all superfluous gestures and mannerisms. After World War II he became an advocate of Bartók, Stravinsky and Hindemith, whose music had long been outlawed in Germany. But his chief love was Mozart, whose works he conducted in a remarkably relaxed and delicate way. This is shown particularly by his recordings of Idomeneo and La finta giardiniera. He also recorded a complete cycle of Beethoven's symphonies. Schmidt-Isserstedt composed orchestral works, chamber music, lieder and dramatic music, including the opera Hassan gewinnt, first performed in Rostock in 1928.

HANS CHRISTOPH WORBS

Schmiedeknecht, Johann Matthäus (b Ülleben, nr Gotha, 1660; d Gotha, April 1715). German composer and teacher. After working in Ichtershausen he became court Kantor in Gotha in 1685 and was a respected if not specially important music teacher. He had connections with the court Kapellmeisters Wolfgang Mylius and Christian Witt, and with the traditional musical institutions of Gotha, which were linked with the names of Pachelbel, Telemann and, in music education, Andreas Reyher. His Tyrocinium musices is related to Reyher's Gothaer Schulmethodus and is dedicated to 'enthusiastic and music-loving youth', following the model of the textbooks by Schneegass, Dedekind and others. His compositions, many of them in the traditional form of the motet for two choirs, show a marked personal touch in their rhythmic and dynamic subtlety.

G. KRAFT

Schmieder, Wolfgang (b Bromberg, 29 May 1901; d Freiburg, 8 Nov 1990). German music librarian. He studied musicology at Heidelberg University with Kroyer and Moser, and philology, German literature and art history as secondary subjects; in 1927 he took the doctorate at Heidelberg with a dissertation on melodic construction in the lieder of Neidhart von Reuental. After serving as assistant lecturer in the musicology department at Heidelberg (1927–30), he studied librarianship at the Sächsischen Landesbibliothek, Dresden, and at the Leipzig University Library. In 1934 he passed the state examination for administration of specialist libraries in Leipzig, taking an additional examination in the handling of printed music. After acting as librarian at the Technische Hochschule in Dresden (1931–3), he became director of the archives of Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig (1933–42). In 1946 he founded the music division of the City and University Library in Frankfurt am Main, which he then directed until 1963. Schmieder's extensive work in music bibliography and manuscript and source studies was dominated by his Bach-Werke-Verzeichnis, a basic tool for Bach research.

HANS HEINRICH EGGEBRECHT

Schmiedt, Siegfried (b Suhl, Thuringia, *c*1756; d Suhl, 1799). German composer and music dealer. From 1786 he was a proofreader for Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig, where he dispatched for printing his own and other composers' works with the greatest care (for which J.A. Hiller thanked him in the foreword to his Allgemeines Choral-Melodien-Buch). He also produced piano arrangements of stage works, including Dittersdorf's Hieronymus Knicker (?1787), Das rothe Käppchen (1792) and Der Schiffspatron (1793), Mozart's Der Schauspieldirektor (1792), Così fan tutte (?1794) and La clemenza di Tito (?1795) and probably some by Hiller, all published by Breitkopf & Härtel. In 1796 he opened his own music store with Rau in Leipzig, but two years later it had closed and he returned to Suhl.

Schmiedt was praised by his contemporaries as an excellent song composer who combined distinguished learning with his talent as a pianist and composer (GerberNL). He was a charming, unassuming figure among the Rococo song and keyboard composers in Leipzig, and his works show the influence of both the Berlin lied school and Hiller's philanthropic, folklike lieder. His settings of A.F. Langbein's poems are light-hearted little songs with French ornamentation and Italian coloratura; the clavichord may have been the most suitable accompanying instrument for these delicate pieces and his numerous other lieder. His graceful and fashionable keyboard pieces, likewise music for use in the home, are best played on the clavichord or fortepiano.

DIETER HÄRTWIG

Schmit, Camille (b Aubange, 30 March 1908; d Limelette, 11 May 1976). Belgian composer and organist. At the Brussels Conservatory he studied the organ with Malengreau, fugue with L. Jongen and composition with J. Jongen. He was organist at Longwy (1923–39) and at Arlon (1940–48), and then he taught harmony (1947–59) and counterpoint (1959–66) at the Liège Conservatoire. From 1966 to 1973 he directed the French section of the Brussels Conservatory. His creative output may be divided into two periods: in the first he was strongly influenced by Stravinsky, but in 1948 he turned, under Souris' influence, to the 12-note system. He had already written the atonal Woodwind Trio (1945) in furtherance of his wish to compose objective music, although the orchestral Trois préludes joyeux (1946) have a discreet touch of irony. The Music for Piano and Orchestra (1949) has a powerful dramatic atmosphere, despite the sobriety of the dialogue between the soloist and the ensemble. In later works the constraints of serial writing did not inhibit Schmit's originality: his Eluard song La halte des heures (1958) accords equal importance to the voice and to the piano, the latter being treated like an orchestra, so as to bring out the multiple suggestions of the text. Further works include a Piano Concerto (1955) and other orchestral music, instrumental pieces, mélodies, cantatas and choral works. His music is published mainly by CeBeDeM, Leduc and the Société d'Editions Musicales. Schmit has withdrawn a great number of works from his catalogue.

HENRI VANHULST

Schmitt, Bernhard. See SCHMID, BERNHARD (i).

Schmitt, Florent (b Blâmont, Meurthe-et-Moselle, 28 Sept 1870; d Neuilly-sur-Seine, Paris, 17 Aug 1958). French composer, pianist and critic. Throughout his life, Schmitt was valued for his independent spirit and refusal to be identified with any school or group. In a time when many composers embraced Impressionism, his music, albeit influenced by Debussy, was admired for its energy, dynamism, grandeur, and virility, for its union of French clarity and German strength. While some works, especially youthful ones, reveal a desire to please and are sometimes facile, many others refuse lyrical abandon and sentimentality and are formed of a wilful and premeditated complexity as well as a passion for strong bold colours, violent emotions and extreme contrasts. Schmitt was considered a pioneer during his lifetime, rejected by some and embraced by others for a style that influenced and helped prepare for later innovations by Stravinsky, Ravel, Honegger and Roussel.

Schmitt was born in Lorraine near the German border. His parents loved music and assiduously controlled what he listened to, steering him toward the Classical and German Romantic repertories. His father hoped he would become an organist. At 17 he entered the Nancy Conservatoire where he studied the piano with Henri Hess and harmony with its director, Gustave Sandré. According to his biographer Pierre-Octave Ferroud, Schmitt's most significant musical experience during this period was Franck's Violin Sonata. In October 1889 he was admitted to the Paris Conservatoire where he earned second prizes in harmony classes with Dubois and Lavignac. Although he never reached distinction in his fugue studies with Gédalge, he was allowed to pursue composition with Massenet (1890) and Fauré (1896). During his military service at Saint-Cloud, he played the flute under music director Jean Gay, a student of d'Indy. In the 1890s Schmitt began a life-long friendship with Ravel, also in Fauré's composition class, met Debussy at the Aubèrge du Clou, and was often seen in 'interminable discussions' with Satie. He also frequented concerts of Russian music and indulged his interest in Wagner, according to Henri Busser, by reputedly attending all performances of Lohengrin at the Opéra. When Richard Strauss conducted his works at the Concerts Lamoureux in 1899, Schmitt encountered a composer whose style he was soon to embrace.

Between 1894 and 1900, Schmitt had vocal, piano and chamber music performed at eight concerts of the Société Nationale. But much of his time was spent writing works for five Prix de Rome competitions: Mélusine (1896), Frédégonde (which won him the second prize in 1897), Radegonde (1898), Callirhoé (1899) and finally Sémiramis (first prize in 1900). Eugène and Edouard Adenis's story for the winning cantata deprives the queen of her heroic stature and contributions to civilization. Schmitt uses musical means to make the banality of the love story seem tragic. Saint-Saëns, Reyer and Massenet argued for his prize, but it was the painters on the jury who made the vote definitive. The Concerts Colonne performed the work on 11 December 1900.

Schmitt's three years in and immediately after his return from Rome were among his most productive. There he befriended the architects Paul Bigot and Tony Garnier. At the same time, he indulged his passion for travel, undertaking trips to Russia and North Africa, and in the autumn of 1903 accepting a French government mission to visit Greece and Turkey. Travel represented to him a symbol of freedom and a release from intellectual and social boundaries. Some of the works he composed during this time reflect these experiences: the piano duets, Feuillets de voyage and Reflets d'Allemagne (eight waltzes inspired by German and Austrian towns), the orchestral suite Musiques en plein air and the symphonic poem Sélamik (inspired by Islam and conceived for military band).

The works from this period, especially his envois from Rome, established his reputation as an innovator. Whereas, among the earlier piano works, Soirs suggests Schumann and Musiques forains Chabrier, his Nuits romaines (1901) anticipates the orchestral approach to the piano in Ravel's Miroirs. Schmitt extended this pianistic writing in his first-year envoi, the first movement of his Quintet (completed in 1908). In this three-part cyclical work of vast dimensions and complex construction, the composer astonished with what seemed like pianistic endurance tests – startling juxtapositions using the entire range of the piano, long chromatic lines in frenetic crescendos and extended writing for piano on four staves as the strings reduce to static trills. The music proceeds from one contrasting texture to another, some dense and fiery, others more lyrical and ethereal. The Quintet turned chamber music into something heroic in intent and epic in scope. Critics, such as in America where Schmitt himself played it on his 1932–3 tour, considered it one of the pre-eminent chamber works of its time.

Schmitt's second-year envoi, a symphonic poem inspired by the Ramayana, Combat des Rakasas et délivrance de Sîta (lost in a 1910 flood), and his chorus with orchestra, Danses des devadasis, continue his interest in evoking distant civilizations and show a preference for implicit rather than explicit musical narration. A third-year envoi, the Etude pour le Palais hanté d'Edgar Poe, dedicated to the influential music critic Willy, refuses to follow the text literally, instead suggesting the fantastic vision elicited by Mallarmé's translation. Both these works prepared for his subsequent setting of a Robert d'Humières poem, La tragédie de Salomé. This 1907 ballet began as a commission from Jacques Rouché for Loie Fuller and the Théâtre des Arts. In it, the sea acts as 'magical mirror', the drama and music called upon to 'comment on the demonic phantasmagoria'. Schmitt expanded the original scoring for 20 instruments into a fully orchestrated symphonic poem in 1910. The prelude begins in the spirit of Debussy, with melancholic arabesques and tritones on the english horn, intercutting between various timbres at the bar line. Part two begins with a pentatonic scale in the harps and uses wordless female voices, beginning with a soloist offstage doubled by an oboe, the voices increasing in number as the intensity grows. As in many orientalist works, Schmitt uses erotic dancing and hysteria as occasions for musical innovation. In the animated 'Danse des éclairs', during which Salomé was to appear nude for an instant, and the 'Danse de l'effroi', in which a storm was to erupt as she danced, the rhythmic syncopations, polyrhythms, percussively treated chords, bitonality, and scoring anticipate those of Stravinsky's 'Danse sacrale' from The Rite of Spring. After its concert première on 8 January 1911 and the first staged production at the Théâtre du Châtelet with Natalie Trouhanova, Stravinsky, to whom the 1910 version is dedicated, wrote to Schmitt, 'I am only playing French music – yours, Debussy, Ravel'. As he was composing The Rite Stravinsky admitted, 'I confess that [Salomé] has given me greater joy than any work I have heared in a long time'. The ballet became one of Schmitt's best-known works. Karsavina danced it at the Ballets Russes in 1913 and Ida Rubinstein at the Opéra in 1919.

Schmitt's most important envoi was his last, Psalm xlvii (xlvi in the Vulgate). At its première in December 1906, Nadia Boulanger played the organ and Henri Busser conducted. Although the orchestral juxtapositions and middle-section harp and woodwind textures recall Debussy's style, the work aims for something else. With its text glorifying God, its imitative counterpoint, extensive brass, and exalted expressivity, this work gave renewed vitality to the polyphonic tradition. At the same time, its frenetic movement, violent accents, bold harmonies and audacious contrasts defied the convention of religious music. Many considered it more Semitic than Christian, reflecting the awesome power and mystery of the Old Testament. The work helped inaugurate a new era in religious music, foreshadowing that of Lili Boulanger, Honegger, Stravinsky and Roussel.

The solid construction, extreme colours, and sometimes violent emotions of his envois make of Schmitt a musical 'Fauve'. Yet he also had an ironic, humorous side, perhaps influenced by Chabrier. His Marche burlesque from Feuillets de voyage seems to parody Lenepveu's march from Jeanne d'Arc: it was first performed at the Société Nationale a year after Ravel lost the Prix de Rome to a Lenepveu student. The military march from his Humoresques ironically ends by fizzling out. Other works too express this tendency: his Serenade burlesque for piano, Pupazzi (a musical commentary on 18th-century commedia dell'arte figures turned into a ballet for the Théâtre des Arts in 1912), Musiques foraines (duets about parades, clowns, elephants and wooden horses), his indolent march of the comic, Fonctionnaire MCMXII (subtitled 'inaction in music') and his Ronde burlesque taken from a hypothetical ballet about underwater battle.

After World War I, during which he wrote for chorus and military band, Schmitt continued in the directions established by his envois. Composing for the piano remained a preliminary activity to later orchestrations and ballets (such as Le petit elfe ferme-l'oeil staged in 1924 and Reflets, staged in 1932). The orientalism of Légende for viola, violin or saxophone and orchestra returns in his incidental music for Gide's Antoine et Cléopatre (1920) in which he revisits the brutality and colour of the Orient and sets battle scenes alongside orgies, a ferocious Cleopatra next to a languourous one. If Salomé expresses the conflict between two religions, Antoine et Cléopatre, his only incidental music for the stage, is the conflict between two civilizations. Ida Rubinstein danced in the première at the Opéra on 14 June 1920. She also appeared in Serge Lifar's choreography for Schmitt's Oriane et le Prince d'amour, a ballet evoking the troubadours which had its première at the Opéra in 1938. Schmitt also returned to Biblical tales in his Danse d'Abisag taken from the book of Kings and his music to accompany a film based on Flaubert's Salammbô. The latter flopped when it was shown at the Opéra in 1925 because of the mediocre quality of the film, the excessive orchestration and the audience's discomfort with the new genre.

Schmitt emerged as one of the most important French composers of his generation. While Satie told young composers to 'kill yourselves rather than orchestrate as badly as Florent Schmitt', others admired him as the 'Wild Boar of the Vosges'. In 1922–4 he was Director of the Lyons Conservatoire and in 1924 was sent to represent France at the ISCM Festival in Prague. In September 1931, he was awarded the Légion d' Honneur. His American tour in 1932–3, including Koussevitzky's première of his Symphonie concertante in Boston, along with performances in Moscow in 1934, confirmed his international standing. In 1936 he beat Stravinsky in a vote of 28 to 4 for Paul Dukas' seat at the Institut.

During World War II, Schmitt continued to be very active. A fierce nationalist, he was also thought to have sympathized with the Vichy regime. The Association de musique contemporaine, of which he was president, and the Revue musicale sponsored a festival of his chamber music at the Ecole Normale in February 1942. His Quatre poèmes de Ronsard, though modernist in their complexity and difficult to perform, were praised for achieving a harmonious balance between contradictory aspects of his aesthetic. His music on this programme – chamber works such as A tour d'anches for woodwind trio and piano, and En bonnes voix for six a cappella choruses – announced the direction his music would take in his final years. Besides numerous choruses setting Latin texts and culminating in a Mass (1958), major works include a String Trio first performed by the Pasquier Trio, a Quartet for the Calvet Quartet, and his Symphony first given at the Strasbourg Festival on 15 June 1958. Critics found in this last work the achievement of a harmonious equilibrium between power and lightness, violence and meditative calm.

Throughout his life, Schmitt worked as a critic, writing for La France before 1913 and later for Revue de France and Le temps (1929–39). His sarcasm, irony and penchant for wit were sometimes disconcerting, but often insightful. This outlet allowed him to promote Chabrier, Lalo, Franck, Saint-Saëns and especially Fauré as responsible for a renaissance of 'pure music'. It also documents his fascination for Rimsky-Korsakov (his Golden Cockerel more than Antar or Sheherazade), Stravinsky (his early ballets and especially, The Nightingale more than Mavra, Oedipus rex and Le baiser de la fée), and Schoenberg (especially Pierrot lunaire, but not the serial works). Schmitt used his influence to welcome jazz, radio and recordings.

Schmitt, Georgius Adamus Josephus. See SCHMITT, JOSEPH.

Schmitt, Joseph [Georgius Adamus Josephus] (b Gernsheim am Rhein, bap. 18 March 1734; d Amsterdam, 28 May 1791). German composer and music publisher, active in the Netherlands. His musical education under Carl Friedrich Abel must have taken place in Dresden before 1758, the year Abel left the Hofkapelle there and settled in London. On 2 October 1753 Schmitt took vows at the Cistercian monastery at Eberbach im Rheingau, where he wrote many sacred and secular works. On 9 October 1757 he was ordained priest. From 1763 at the latest the care of the music in the monastery seems to have been entrusted to him as regens chori. Before 1767 he established a connection with the music publisher J.J. Hummel in Amsterdam, who from this time until 1773 took six luxuriously printed collections of instrumental pieces by Schmitt into his catalogue. In 1771 payments by the monastery for music abruptly ceased, and by 1774 Schmitt had printed his op.7 in Amsterdam under his own imprint. (His setting of the Dutch Evangelische gezangen, 1783, and entry into the Amsterdam lodge 'La Charité' cannot, in view of the toleration of the Enlightenment, serve as proof that he had renounced his priesthood.)

In Schmitt's early years in the Netherlands he earned his livelihood from his publishing firm (which at first brought out only his own compositions) and perhaps by teaching, as is indicated by his Principes de la musique dédiés à tous les commençans and by the violin duos op.8 (1773–4) which exhibit a strong didactic bias. When the Felix Meritis Society of Amsterdam opened a new building in 1788, Schmitt was appointed director of the music section. At his death he was succeeded in this post by Bartholomeus Ruloffs, and in his publishing firm by Vincent Springer (a relative of Schmitt's by marriage), a basset-horn player who continued the business until the end of the century.

Joseph Schmitt is hopelessly confused in early literature with Karl Joseph Schmitt, a native of Eltville (Rheingau) who worked as a music director in Amsterdam and Frankfurt. Joseph's importance can be appreciated only from a full consideration of his various activities – as teacher, music director, publisher, and above all as composer. Knowledge of him as a teacher is handicapped by the absence of the violin method ascribed to him (the Principes de la musique contains merely elementary information on general music teaching) and of the names of important pupils. As director of the Felix Meritis concerts, however, whose functions were later taken over by the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, Schmitt occupied the most important musical post that Amsterdam could then offer. As a publisher he was in keen competition with Hummel – a catalogue of 1793 cited by Gerber apparently carried over 500 titles. Works published by Schmitt and Springer achieved wide international distribution, particularly in the Scandinavian countries, where they were the primary means of making known the works of the Viennese Classical composers (Schmitt's was principally a reprint firm).

The range of Schmitt's compositions covers church music, symphonies, concertos, chamber music in various combinations and a few sacred songs. As early as 1773 Burney praised 'the boldness, spirit and accuracy' of Schmitt's string trios. Contemporary writers gave prominence to the 'Feuer, Erfindung und Gesang' of his op.1 (J.A. Hiller, ed.: Wöchentliche Nachrichten die Musik betreffend, ii, Leipzig, 1767/R, p.187) and expressed the opinion that his works needed no special recommendation because of the author's well-established reputation (C.F. Cramer, ed.: Magazin der Musik, i, Hamburg, 1783/R, p.73). The blind flautist F.L. Dülon, Schmitt's fellow pupil under Abel, asserted in 1808 that Schmitt's compositions were certainly not the equal of Abel's, but that in 'ardour, boldness and sublimity' they were 'fashioned throughout with the same purity of texture . . . and facility of style' (Wieland). The masses, Requiem and Te Deum presumably originated during the Eberbach period, and in view of the ample layout and the instrumentation, which ranged far beyond the resources of the monastery, must have served only for festal occasions. Schmitt's preference for instrumental music is already apparent in the frequently rather meagre treatment of the voice parts, which often had to negotiate unvocal passages in the fugal movements.

The foremost musical influence in Schmitt's youth must have been his teacher Abel, and through him the neighbouring Mannheim symphonists and the Mainz composer J. Zach. In form and thematic construction, Schmitt's music closely followed the example of Mannheim. Smooth, elegant melodic lines, interlaced with conventional figures in allegro movements, are counterpoised by adagios of a delicate cantabile which even his contemporaries singled out for praise. In his Amsterdam years the influence of his publishing associations with the works of the Viennese Classical composers must have had an effect: the melodic substance becomes more pithy and thoughtful, the groups of themes are formally more broadly devised and are more contrasted, the development gains in significance, slow introductions appear in the first movements, and the instrumentation is extended (see the Sinfonie pastorale op.18). More than a dozen of Schmitt's works have been wrongly attributed to Haydn. The lost vocal compositions of the Felix Meritis concerts, with their bizarre experiments in tone-painting (e.g. the igniting of gunpowder), seem to have appealed to contemporary amateur taste.

ALBERT DUNNING

Schmittbaur [Schmittbauer], Joseph Aloys (b Bamberg, 8 Nov 1718; d Karlsruhe, 24 Oct 1809). German composer, conductor and glass harmonica maker. He received his musical education from the organ builder J.P. Seuffert in Würzburg and was a musician at the Rastatt court from about 1745 until its dissolution in 1771. There he was Konzertmeister in 1762 (leading the orchestra from the harpsichord) and Kapellmeister from 1765. In 1772 he became Konzertmeister at the Karlsruhe court, but in 1775 he went to Cologne as Kapellmeister at the cathedral and director of public concerts. Although his stay was brief, he had a lasting influence on Cologne's musical life through his sacred compositions (in particular his mass for Epiphany, 1776, published in 1781) and through his introduction of modern orchestral methods in the style of Mannheim. In 1777 he accepted an invitation to return to Karlsruhe as Kapellmeister, and was also active there as a teacher and maker of glass harmonicas, whose range he extended from two octaves to four (c to c''''). At his retirement in 1804 (he was honoured with the title Oberkapellmeister in 1806) his son, Abbé Ludwig Joseph Schmittbaur (1755–1829), a lieder composer, took his place at court; two other sons, August (b 1763), a clarinettist and flautist, and Nepomuk, a violinist, also belonged to the Karlsruhe Hofkapelle, and his daughter Therese was known as a singer and keyboard player in the 1770s.

Schmittbaur's compositions were highly esteemed in the 1780s but his pre-Classical style, for example in his symphonies patterned on the Mannheim school, was soon outdated. His serenata L'isola disabitata, shows the influence of Jommelli, who was in Stuttgart after 1753; his later serenata for the wedding of the Crown Prince Karl Ludwig in 1774, Endymion, reflected the opera reforms of Gluck, whom he knew personally. Several of his chamber works were published, including a Paris print of six quartets for flute and strings falsely attributed to Haydn. His most famous pupil was Marianne Kirchgässner, who used a glass harmonica made by Schmittbaur when she improvised for Mozart in 1791.

KLAUS WOLFGANG NIEMÖLLER

Schmitz, (Franz) Arnold (b Sablon, nr Metz, 11 July 1893; d Mainz, 1 Nov 1980). German musicologist. He attended school in Metz and then studied piano with Max van de Sandt and composition with A. Beer-Walbrunn, H. Kaun and F. Bölsche at Cologne. After the war he studied musicology, history and philosophy at the Universities of Bonn, Munich and Berlin, where his teachers included Schiedermair, Sandberger, Kroyer, Wolf and Friedlaender. In 1919 he received the doctorate from Bonn University with a dissertation on the young Schumann's conceptions of musical creation. He served as Klemperer's assistant at the Cologne Opera before completing the Habilitation at Bonn University in 1921 with a work on the Cologne Jesuit musicians of the 17th century. He taught at Bonn University and, from 1925, at Dortmund Conservatory until 1929, when he became professor at Breslau University and director of the Church Music Institute. After war service he was appointed professor of musicology at the new University of Mainz; he was rector of the university (1953–4 and 1960–61) and retired in 1961.

Schmitz's activities at Bonn naturally led to his research on Beethoven and he became a distinguished but not exclusive specialist in that field. In 1937 he edited the Schiedermair Festschrift Beethoven und die Gegenwart and the same year began the series Breslauer Studien zur Musikwissenschaft.

KARL GEIRINGER

Schmölzer, Jakob Eduard (b Graz, 9 March 1812; d Kindberg, Styria, 9 Jan 1886). Austrian flautist and composer. He played in an orchestra of the Steiermärkischer Musikverein at the age of 13, and in 1825 was for a time a pupil of Theobald Boehm. He studied music theory with Hüttenbrenner and Halm, and performed under Kreutzer and the elder Hellmesberger. Late in 1839 he made an extensive and successful concert tour, meeting, among others, Constanze Mozart, Lindpainter, Mendelssohn and Liszt. Though much admired as a performer, Schmölzer did not regard himself as a professional musician; he was for many years engaged in administrative work in Styria, and from 1862 was in the service of Graf Fritz Attems at Oberkindberg. In 1860, at a meeting of a number of distinguished singers, Schmölzer conceived the idea of an all-German Sängerbund, and this led to the founding of a music journal, Die Sängerhalle.

PHILIP BATE

Schmügel, Johann Christoph (b Pritzier, bap. 13 Jan 1727; d Mölln, 21 Oct 1798). German organist and composer. He first received instruction from his father, also named Johann Christoph Schmügel (d 16 Feb 1771), who was organist of Pritzier. He then went to Hamburg to study with Telemann, who in a letter of recommendation to the Johanniskirche, Lüneburg, described him as one of the best pupils in composition he had ever instructed. In spite of this, Schmügel did not obtain the post of organist at the Johanniskirche until 1758, when the next vacancy arose. During his years in Lüneburg (1758–65) he taught the lied composer J.A.P. Schulz and maintained his contacts with Hamburg (the dedication of his Sing-und Spieloden of 1762 speaks of receiving special encouragement in Hamburg from English merchants, and Gerber cited an Ode auf das Hamburger Wohl for 1766). In 1766 he left Lüneburg for an organist's post at the Nikolaikirche in Mölln, where in 1784 he also became Kantor. He is best known for his lied collection of 1762, which helped to transmit the Hamburg tradition and was noteworthy for the independence of its keyboard parts in the Spieloden.

GEORG KARSTÄDT

Schnabel, Artur (b Lipnik, 17 April 1882; d Axenstein, Switzerland, 15 Aug 1951). Austrian pianist and composer, later naturalized American. When he was seven his family moved to Vienna, where he studied the piano with Leschetizky and theory with Mandyczewski. Of Leschetizky he once said that his teaching offered no method of any kind, but something infinitely more important: it was 'like a current which sought to release all latent vitality in the student'. Leschetizky in his turn told Schnabel: 'You will never be a pianist; you are a musician'. And in keeping with this judgment, he allowed Schnabel to ignore Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies and encouraged him to work at some of Schubert's sonatas, which at that time were completely neglected. So with his début in 1890 began a career which became more and more devoted only to music which, as Schnabel used to say, 'was better than it could be performed'. He would not have been attracted to a lifetime of piano playing on any other basis. That was the true meaning of Leschetizky's remark: for Schnabel the instrument itself was a medium, not an accomplice.

In 1900 Schnabel went to Berlin, where he lived until a few months after Hitler came to power in 1933. He married the contralto Therese Behr (1876–1959) in 1905. She was already a renowned interpreter of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms, and there can be no doubt that she played an important part in Schnabel's artistic development. Their many concerts together culminated in a historic series of Schubert recitals they gave in Berlin in 1928. By then her career was ending, while he was approaching the height of his powers. At various times he also formed ensembles with Flesch and Becker, with Casals, Feuermann, Fournier, Hindemith, Huberman, Szigeti and Primrose. He said, in My Life and Music, that the years from 1919 to 1924 were musically the most stimulating and perhaps the happiest he knew. It was then that he made friends with many younger men such as Ernst Krenek and Eduard Erdmann, took part in one of the early performances of Pierrot lunaire, and wrote several works, including three string quartets. It was a period when composing, and the search for a new and individual language, filled his thoughts more than ever before. At the same time he 'learned how to play Beethoven' – in other words, evolved his own entirely original readings which have made him justly famous. He was, in fact, a creative virtuoso of the old school; not a Busoni (and he would have been the first to admit that), but a composer of some consequence whose playing belonged to another category from that of even the greatest instrumentalists who were that and nothing more.

In 1925 he entered another phase, devoted to performing and teaching (Clifford Curzon and later Claude Frank were among his pupils). He was invited to take the piano class at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin, and for the next five years, until he left, maintained standards that became legendary. In the meantime he had been twice to the USA (the first time in 1921), had returned to England after an absence of 20 years and aroused enthusiasm with his playing of Schubert and Beethoven, which came as a revelation to audiences there; and in 1932, after protracted negotiations with HMV, he began making records of all Beethoven's sonatas (the first such undertaking in the history of the gramophone), as well as of the concertos (with Sargent and the LPO and LSO) and the Diabelli Variations. HMV's electrical recordings capture Schnabel's Bechstein with warmth and richness and can still be held up as models of microphone balance and faithful piano sound. In 1927, for the centenary year, he had played all the 32 sonatas in Berlin; and between 1932 and 1934 he played them again, first in Berlin and then in London, and these concerts marked the climax of his career. After leaving Berlin he gave summer classes at Tremezzo, on Lake Como, and then, from 1940 to 1945, at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. In 1939 he had emigrated to the USA, taking American nationality in 1944. His stature was never as widely recognized there as in Europe, and although he made excellent versions of Beethoven's concertos nos.4 and 5 with the Chicago SO, the American record industry took little interest in him. (The agents wanted him to change his programmes and to conform to their convenient patterns of salesmanship; as a result, he dispensed altogether with their services during the last eight years of his life.) There was criticism too that his performances of Beethoven did not admit any difference between the expressive functions of melody and of passage-work; that he made everything equally eloquent. For many musicians, on the other hand, it was precisely his articulation of scale passages, accompaniments, and figurations of every kind, as well as his power of individualizing every strand of the texture, that helped to make his playing unique. It was not the melody that suffered, but the other elements which took on an unheard-of vitality.

It is difficult to define at all briefly the qualities that he brought to his favourite composers. In Schubert he managed to combine lyrical expression with a rhythmic élan and discipline that gave everything a new intensity. In Mozart, to whom he turned increasingly in later life, he tended to idealize the music and sometimes to adopt very slow tempos; but at his best he showed a deeper understanding than his contemporaries – in many of the concertos, for example (he recorded five piano concertos, plus the Concerto for two pianos with his son KARL ULRICH SCHNABEL), and in the wonderful recordings of the Rondo in A minor K511 and the A minor Sonata K310. These also show to perfection the beauty of his phrasing, and his power of sustaining a long line without ever letting it become dull or lifeless. But despite his incomparable playing of Schubert, heard above all on his recordings of the late A major and B♭ sonatas, Schnabel will always be associated principally with Beethoven, and especially with the last sonatas. Here he often achieved a visionary quality in which the piano itself was almost forgotten; and although he allowed himself a remarkable rhythmic freedom at times, his readings were still faithful to the composer's intentions: to the spirit rather than to the letter. The truth is that in playing these great works his own imaginative world found its fullest expression. Clifford Curzon said that there were technical things that Schnabel could not do which hundreds of pianists could, and, conversely, things which he could do which no other pianist could. On his recordings the beauty of sound immediately draws the listener in; and yet he so often seems to transcend the instrument. In his lifetime he changed people's perceptions of Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert, and the best of his recordings still have the capacity to do that for each new generation.

Other things were secondary, but still belonged to his character as a 'creative virtuoso'. Of his books, the most important is My Life and Music. His editions of Beethoven's sonatas and of the Diabelli Variations provide an invaluable insight into his modelling of the music and the subtle choice of fingering that went with it. His compositions, few of them published, include three symphonies, five string quartets, a piano concerto written when he was 19, many songs of the same early period, Seven Pieces for piano, a Rhapsody for orchestra, a string trio, and his last work, Duodecimet for strings, wind and percussion, a small masterpiece.

WILLIAM GLOCK/STEPHEN PLAISTOW

Schnabel, Joseph Ignaz (b Naumburg am Queiss, 24 May 1767; d Breslau [now Wrocław], 16 June 1831). German church musician and composer. The son of a Kantor, he attended the Gymnasium in Breslau and sang in the Vincentiuskirche, then training as a teacher. He later attracted attention for the musical attainments of his pupils as a rural schoolmaster in Paritz where he taught from 1790. In 1797 he was appointed organist of St Clara in Breslau and during the same period violinist in the orchestra of the Vincentius kirche and the theatre orchestra, which he also often conducted. His later appointments included Kapellmeister of the cathedral (1805), director of the Richter winter concerts (1806) and the Montags- und Freitagsgesellschaft (1810), director of music at the university (1812), teacher at the Catholic seminary and director of the Royal Institute of Church Music, which he helped to found. At a time when sacred music was at a low ebb in south Germany, before the impact of the Cecilian Movement, Schnabel did much to rejuvenate and improve it through his many compositions and performances.

In the secular arena, where Schnabel was equally active as a composer, he made an outstanding contribution to Breslau's musical life, introducing not only earlier Classical symphonies and choral works (including Haydn's Creation in 1800) but those of contemporaries such as Spohr and Romberg. His achievements were widely known, for example by Beethoven, whose 'Exaudi Domine' Schnabel had copied for cathedral performance. Schnabel's significance for the musical life of Breslau, the music of the Catholic cathedral and musical education of Schlesia is detailed by Hoffmann.

His own music includes eight masses, six vespers and litanies, 22 graduals, offertories, hymns and stations, as well as many songs and sacred and secular partsongs and choruses, some for male quartet, military marches and pieces for wind, a clarinet concerto and a quintet for guitar and string quartet. Still performed is his 'Transeamus usque Bethlehem' for choir and orchestra. A large amount remains in manuscript (see Guckel for complete listing).

Other musically active members of Schnabel's family include his brother Michael Schnabel (1775–1842), a piano manufacturer whose instruments were valued by virtuosos such as Liszt and Hummel, and whose sons Julius and Carl (later a composer) continued his business; and his sons Joseph (1791/4–?), an organist and composer, and August (1795–1863), a conductor and music educator who succeeded his father at the Catholic seminary in Breslau.

MICHAEL MUSGRAVE

Schnabel, Karl Ulrich (b Berlin, 6 Aug 1909). Austrian pianist, son of ARTUR SCHNABEL. He studied with Leonid Kreutzer at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin, 1922–6. Faced with his father's achievement in expressing a new vision of the Classical repertory, he still managed to develop an individual style of playing and a poetic insight of his own. He made his début in Berlin in 1926, and gave recitals throughout Europe until leaving for the USA shortly before World War II. There he married the American pianist, Helen Fogel, with whom he played a large repertory of piano duets. In earlier years he had sometimes played for his mother, the contralto Therese Behr, and the imaginative quality of his accompaniments to the Schubert song cycles is still remembered. He also made some distinguished recordings of Schubert piano duets with his father. After the war he became active both as a teacher and a recitalist. He published Modern Technique of the Pedal (New York, 1950).

Schnebel, Dieter (Wolfgang) (b Lahr, Baden, 14 March 1930). German composer, writer and theologian. After early piano study with Wilhelm Siebler and Wilhelm Resch, he attended the Freiburg Hochschule für Musik (1949–52), where his teachers included Erich Doflein. He became acquainted with the music of the Second Viennese School through fellow student Heinz-Klaus Metzger. In 1950 and 1951 he attended the Darmstadt summer courses, where he met Adorno, Stockhausen, Boulez, Varèse and Nono; it was with the generation of Darmstadt composers who attended the courses after 1957, however, with whom he would be more closely associated. After certification as a music teacher in 1952, Schnebel studied theology, philosophy and musicology at Tübingen University. His doctoral dissertation (1955) focusses on dynamics in Schoenberg's music. His other interests included the writings of Sigmund Freud and Karl Marx, as well as those of his teachers Karl Barth and Ernst Bloch. He was also much influenced by the ideas of Cage.

On the completion of his education, Schnebel taught religious studies in Kaiserslautern (1956–63) and Frankfurt (1963–70), working as a minister from 1960. After the early death of his first wife, Camilla Riegger, in 1968, he underwent a period of psychoanalysis. He married his second wife, Iris von Kaschnitz, in 1970 and began to teach religious studies and music in Munich (1970–76). He was appointed professor of experimental music and musicology at the Hochschule der Künste, Berlin, in 1976 (professor emeritus 1995) and became a member of the Akademie der Künste, Berlin, in 1991.

Schnebel has organized his musical output under conceptual headings, identifying pieces developed from distinct types of approaches as belonging together. Often these groups of compositions can be performed as single works, with individual pieces functioning as movements. Precise groupings and group titles have changed from time to time to reflect a recontextualization of certain pieces; this concern for accurate categorization implies that compositions within each group act as related aesthetic or philosophical statements. The four pieces titled Versuche (1953–6) are characterized by frequent and mathematically logical changes of rhythm and metre. Operating outside the normal limits of notation, they reflect Schnebel's attempt to create a truly rational compositional language. The works included under the heading für stimmen (... missa est) (1956–69) take a radical and critical approach to the expression of sacred texts. Suggesting a mediation between the possibilities and limitations of serialism, the series introduces a subversive impulse that erodes the composer's control over temporal, linguistic and vocal processes. In doing so, it forms a critique of serialism embedded in modernist serial processes. Notable constituent works include dt 31,6 (1956–8), a setting of Deuteronomy xxxi.6 which explores a serial technique based on expressive and constantly distorted vocal fragments, and :! (madrasha 2) (1958–68), which, through its unpronounceable title, establishes a disturbing identity between human voices and taped animal cries.

Schnebel's output of the 1960s includes a number of conceptual works, many of which distinguish between the potential compositional framework of a piece and its possible realizations. The most important of these is the meta-composition glossolalie (1959–61), a set of conceptual modules; significant realizations include Schnebel's Glossolalie 61 (1960–61) and the Ensemble Recherche's Glossolalie 94 (1994). Other conceptual works include réactions for solo instrumentalist and public (1960–) and nostalgie for conductor (1962). These can be compared with 'happenings' or performance art. Two of them were realized by Kagel as short films around the time of Schnebel's completion of his detailed study of Kagel's works, Mauricio Kagel: Musik, Theatre, Film (Cologne, 1970).

Schnebel has identified an important break in his style and ideas in 1968, the year his first wife died. Although partially based on the belief that his previous music was too esoteric and that he should reach a larger public, the break can also be seen as a reaction to the political events of that year. Whatever the exact motivation, he developed a virtuoso use of simple vocal articulations in Maulwerke (1968–74), of movement in Körper-Sprache (1979–80) and of elements of music notation in MO-NO, Music zum Lesen (1969). A new social commitment is represented in the Schulmusik series (1973–87).

From about 1970 Schnebel began to construct works based on pre-modern traditions. The first group of these are the Re-Visionen pieces (1970–89), recompositions of various canonic works. Perhaps the most remarkable example is the Schubert-Phantasie (1977–8, rev. 1989), which remodels Schubertian harmonies into a fluid texture composition. The second and larger group of works is entitled Tradition (1975–98). Some of these are similar to works of performance art; the bizarre vocalizations of Thanatos-Eros (1979–82, rev. 1985) caused an audience uproar at its première. Stage works evoking a place or narrative include Jowaegerli (1982–3), based on Alemannish dialect and culture, and St Jago (1989–91), which relates Heinrich von Kleist's account of a South American earthquake. Later works in the series include three large compositions that represent Schnebel's negotiations with and reinterpretations of the musical past: the Missa (1984–7), Sinfonie X (1987–92) and Majakowskis Tod (1984–7). The Missa can be seen as a resolution of the fragmented anti-theology of the für stimmen works; it is clearly the completion of a project that goes back to 1956. The overlapping forms of the vast Sinfonie X, which takes over two hours to perform, include performed and taped materials spatially and temporally distributed within and around a concert performance. The title suggests that the work is an algebraic variable of a symphony, a tenth symphony after the eponymous ninth, or an amalgamation of possible symphonies at the end of the 20th century. Majakowskis Tod, an opera based on the final days of the Russian poet, has not been finished. Although these works have been criticized as nostalgic reconstructions of a vanished past, they could not have been written, much less understood, without the conceptual, deconstructive and meticulously experimental works of Schnebel's earlier style.

The groups of works written after the Tradition series primarily refer to cultural areas outside of music. Categories such as 'mobile' music, 'psychoanalytic' music and 'ecological' music emphasize the symbolic nature of all of Schnebel's works, even those not exhibiting verbal or dramatic references; the sensual immediacy of the music remains secondary to the range of its philosophical implications. Schnebel's view that composition is a means of conveying deeper understanding, not a platform for a spectacle of the self, has affected every level of his work. It may also be responsible for his aggressive willingness to dismantle cultural assumptions.

PAUL ATTINELLO

Schneeberger, Hansheinz (b Berne, 16 Oct 1926). Swiss violinist. He attended the Berne Conservatory, then studied with Flesch in Lucerne in 1944, and with Boris Kamensky, 1946–7. In 1946 he made his début with the first performance in Switzerland of Bartók's Second Violin Concerto. He taught the violin at the conservatories of Biel (1948–58) and Berne (1952–8), and from 1952 to 1959 led his own string quartet. From 1961 to 1991 he taught the violin and chamber music at the Musikakademie in Basle.

As well as leading the NDR SO, Hamburg, Schneeberger embarked on a solo career, particularly as an interpreter of contemporary music. He gave the first performances of Martin's Violin Concerto in 1952 with Paul Sacher, Bartók's First Violin Concerto in 1958, also with Sacher, and of Huber's Violin Concerto 'Tempora' in 1958 with Francis Travis. He has also given the premières of works by composers including Heinz Holliger, Hans Ulrich Lehmann and Elliott Carter. Among his recordings are Bach's unaccompanied works and violin and keyboard sonatas, Bartók's Sonata for solo violin (in its original version), Schumann's sonatas and Concerto, and the Sonata and String Trio by Veress.

JÜRG STENZL

Schneegass [Snegassius], Cyriacus [Cyriak] (b Bufleben, nr Gotha, 5 Oct 1546; d Friedrichroda, 23 Oct 1597). German theorist and composer. He attended the Landesschule at Gotha; the Rektor there was Cyriacus Lindemann, whose daughter he later married. From 1565 he studied theology at the University of Jena, where he came under the influence of Nikolaus Selnecker. He graduated in 1568 with a master's degree. According to Kümmerle, he worked as a schoolmaster and cantor from 1568 to 1573. He became a minister, first at Tambach and then, from 1573 until his death, at Friedrichroda. Between 1583 and his death he issued some 18 publications, most notably in the disciplines of theology and music, which show the wide range of his intellectual and artistic interests. For example, he edited much important source material for the study of the Reformation, including 66 letters from Philipp Melanchthon to Friedrich Myconius. He wrote both the words and music for congregational hymns, many of which were popular throughout Germany (J.S. Bach used his text Das neugeborene Kindlein for the chorale cantata of the same name, BWV122). Many of his prayers and poetic texts arose out of the fear of a Turkish invasion.

In chapter 3 of his Nova & exquisita monochordi dimensio Schneegass argued that the ratio of a tempered 5th ought to be 160:107 (a good approximation of a 5th tempered by $\frac{1}{4}$-comma, as Sethus Calvisius perceived), but prescribed also that the diatonic semitone contain $3\frac{1}{4}$ 'commas' and the chromatic $2\frac{1}{4}$. By an ingenious geometrical calculation he applied this rule for the semitones and produced a monochord scheme approximating to $\frac{2}{9}$-comma mean-tone temperament (with major 3rds very slightly larger than pure), though Barbour suggested that he may have confused it with $\frac{1}{4}$-comma mean-tone (with pure major 3rds). His conception of the triad as symbolizing the Trinity clearly anticipates Johannes Lippius's Synopsis musicae novae (1612).

E. FRED FLINDELL

Schnéevoigt, Georg (Lennart) (b Viipuri [now Vyborg, Russia], 8 Nov 1872; d Malmö, 28 Nov 1947). Finnish conductor and cellist. He studied the cello in Helsinki, Sondershausen (with Schröder), Leipzig (with Klengel), Brussels, Dresden and Vienna (with Robert Fuchs). In 1895–8 and 1899–1903 he was solo cellist with the Helsinki PO and taught the cello at the Helsinki College of Music. After his conducting début in Riga in 1901 he was appointed conductor of the Kaim orchestra in Munich (1904–8) and of the Kiev SO (1908–9). He founded and conducted a symphony orchestra in Riga (1909–14) and another in Helsinki (1912–14), which combined in 1914 with Kajanus's Helsinki PO to form the Helsinki City Orchestra. Schnéevoigt and Kajanus were joint conductors of the Helsinki City Orchestra from 1916; on Kajanus's retirement in 1932, Schnéevoigt remained as principal conductor until 1941. From 1915 to 1924 he was principal conductor of the Royal Stockholm PO and from 1919 to 1927 conductor of the Oslo PO (which he founded in 1918). He later held posts in Düsseldorf (1924–6), Los Angeles (1927–9) and Malmö (1930–47). Schnéevoigt was a forceful and dynamic personality whose interpretations were sometimes criticized for excess of emotion, especially in the slow movements of Romantic works; but his secure technique as an orchestral trainer, his sharp perception, and deep involvement in music of all periods won him acclaim. In 1907 he married the pianist Sigrid Ingeborg Sundgren (b Helsinki, 17 June 1878; d Stockholm, 14 Sept 1953) who studied at the Helsinki College of Music, 1886–94, and with Busoni in Berlin, 1894–7; from 1910 she taught at the Helsinki College of Music. She gave recitals and played in orchestral concerts in Europe and the USA, often with her husband conducting.

Schneider. German family of musicians.

(1) (Johann Christian) Friedrich Schneider (b Alt-Waltersdorf, nr Zittau, 3 Jan 1786; d Dessau, 23 Nov 1853). Composer, conductor and teacher. He learnt the piano from his father, Johann Gottlob Schneider (1753–1840), and began composing at a very early age. In 1798 he entered the Zittau Gymnasium and studied music with Schönfelder and Unger, already producing large-scale works, symphonies, masses and opera. In 1804 he published his first works, a set of three piano sonatas, and in the following year he entered the University of Leipzig to continue his musical studies; here he came into contact with A.E. Müller, J.G. Schlicht and J.F. Rochlitz. In 1806 he became singing teacher at the Ratsfreischule, in 1807 organist of the Universitätskirche, in 1810 director of the Secondaschen Opera Company, in 1812 organist of the Thomaskirche, in 1816 conductor of the Singakademie, and in 1817 musical director of the city theatre. His performance of Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto in Leipzig on 28 November 1811 is believed to have been the work's première (see AMZ, xiv, 1812, col.8).

In 1820 Schneider became Hofkapellmeister at Anhalt-Dessau, where he contributed much to improve musical life: he founded a Singakademie, a schoolmasters' choral society, a Liedertafel and (in 1829) a music school, which was successful for about 15 years and had a number of excellent pupils, among them Robert Franz. Between 1820 and 1851 he directed more than 80 German music and singing festivals, most of which included a performance of one of his oratorios. He belonged to numerous musical societies and received honorary doctorates from the universities of Halle and Leipzig in 1830. The highpoint of his wide-ranging compositional activity while at Leipzig came with his oratorio Das Weltgericht, first performed on 6 March 1820 at the Gewandhaus and widely performed thereafter. This work has been seen as an important bridge in a period of stagnation between the oratorios of Haydn and Mendelssohn, and his creative achievements were respected by Schumann. His music is essentially lyrical and contemplative in character.

(2) Johann (Gottlob) Schneider (b Alt-Gersdorf, 28 Oct 1789; d Dresden, 13 April 1864). Organist, teacher and composer, brother of (1) Friedrich Schneider. He also studied music with his father and attended the Zittau Gymnasium. In 1810 he began to study law at the University of Leipzig, but soon gave this up to devote himself to the organ. He became organist of the Universitätskirche in 1811, succeeding his brother, and in 1812 was appointed both choral director of the Ratsfreischule and organist of Sts Peter und Paul in Görlitz; by 1820 he was recognized as one of the leading living organists. Owing to his splendid playing at a Magdeburg festival in 1825, he was appointed court organist in Dresden, a post he held until his death. In this post he had a wide influence and counted Mendelssohn and Liszt among his pupils. In 1861, the 50th year of his artistic career, he was presented with a Jubel-Album für die Orgel comprising works of about 30 of his former pupils (including Liszt, Merkel and Töpfer) and received an honorary doctorate from the University of Leipzig.

As a teacher, Schneider would always end his lessons by playing one of the great organ fugues or chorale preludes of Bach, and was famed for his chorale improvisations in the tradition of Bach before service, on the performance of whose organ music he was considered the leading authority. Mendelssohn expressed great admiration for him, noting his performance of Bach's D major Fugue from Book 1 of the '48' on the organ. Schneider's few published works include an 'Answer of Thanks' to the Jubel-Album and a Fantasia and Fugue in D minor op.3.

(3) (Johann) Gottlieb Schneider (b Alt-Gersdorf, 19 July 1797; d Hirschberg, 4 Aug 1856). Organist and composer, brother of (1) Friedrich Schneider. Like his elder brothers, he studied music with his father and attended the Zittau Gymnasium (1807) and the University of Leipzig (1814). In 1815 he was a music teacher in Bautzen and in 1817 he moved to Sorau as city organist. From 1825 he lived in Hirschberg, where he gained the reputation of an excellent organist at the Kreuzkirche and composed a number of pieces for the organ and piano.

(4) Theodor Schneider (b Dessau, 14 April 1827; d Zittau, 15 June 1909). Cellist and conductor, son of (1) Friedrich Schneider. He began his musical career as a cellist in the Anhalt-Dessau court orchestra, then under his father's direction, and succeeded his father as Kantor and choirmaster of the Schlosskirche in Dessau in 1853. In 1860 he moved to Chemnitz, taking appointments at St Jakobi and the Johanniskirche and directing a Singakademie and a men's choral society. He retired in 1898 on being named professor.

FRANZ GEHRING, E.M. OAKELEY/MICHAEL MUSGRAVE

Schneider, (Abraham) Alexander (b Vilnius, 21 Oct 1908; d New York, 2 Feb 1993). American violinist and conductor of Lithuanian birth. He entered the conservatory in Vilnius at the age of ten and from the age of 16 studied with Adolf Rebner at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt, becoming leader of the Frankfurt Museum Orchestra from 1925 to 1933. He also studied with Flesch in Berlin. For several years he worked in Saarbrücken and Hamburg as well as in Frankfurt, as orchestral leader, assistant conductor, solo violinist and leader of his own quartet.

In 1932 he joined the BUDAPEST QUARTET as second violinist, his elder brother, Mischa, having become its cellist two years before. With the Budapest Quartet he toured extensively and settled in the USA in 1938. In 1944 Schneider left the quartet, but he remained active in chamber music, as a member of the Albeneri Trio with Benar Heifetz and Erich Itor Kahn, in the New York Quartet with Mieczysław Horszowski, Milton Katims and Frank Miller, in duos with Ralph Kirkpatrick and Eugene Istomin, and as head of a chamber orchestra. In 1945 he received the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Medal for services to chamber music. In 1950 he persuaded Casals to come out of retirement and lead a festival at Prades to commemorate the bicentenary of Bach's death, and he continued to be closely associated with Casals, at Prades and Perpignan, at Marlboro, in Israel and in Puerto Rico, where he organized the Festival Casals in 1957. In 1952 Schneider once again became leader of his own quartet, which performed all the Haydn quartets and recorded most of them for the Haydn Society. In 1955 he rejoined the Budapest Quartet, staying until its last concerts in 1967. Schneider was also active as a teacher, as a director of string seminars for young players, as adviser to the Fromm Music Foundation and as an instigator of new concert series. In 1972 he founded and directed a new chamber ensemble, the Brandenburg Players, and he also conducted other American orchestras. Schneider was a thoroughly musical, not always subtle, player, whose performances conveyed infectious enthusiasm and ebullience.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Schneider, Andreas (b ?before 1640; bur. Höxter, 2 March 1685). German organ builder. He lived in Höxter, but is said to have been a native of Dortmund. The keyboard compass, pipe scaling, wind-chest construction, and formation of the mouths on the showpipes of his instruments all indicate that he was probably a pupil of one of the Bader family of organ builders. For a time Schneider was an associate of Peter Heinrich Varenholt (with whom he built the organ at St Pauli, Soest, in 1674–6). From 1677 to 1679 Schneider built a small organ for Marienmünster Abbey (now in Gehrden); in 1680–82 he repaired the large organ there and in 1681 produced a chancel organ and a west-end organ for the church of the Benedictine abbey at Corvey. Both organ cases (in Baroque style) survive, together with four spring-chests of the 'improved' type and a considerable number of the larger organ's pipes. The known specifications of Schneider's organs remain within the style of those of the Bader school and no further independent developments in Westphalian organ building were undertaken by him. He was the first Westphalian builder to make funnel-shaped pipes, which had been known in the Netherlands as early as the beginning of the 17th century. In 1681 Schneider was described by Rhabanus Wernekinck, organist of Münster Cathedral, as 'the best [organ builder] there is at present in Westphalia' (Hans Heinrich Bader had died some time after 1664). For further details see R. Reuter: Orgeln in Westfalen (Kassel, 1965/R).

HANS KLOTZ

Schneider, Conrad Michael (b Ansbach, bap. 28 Aug 1673; d Ulm, 23 Nov 1752). German composer and organist. The son of an Ansbach organist, Abdias Schneider, he was a student at Leipzig University in 1695 and was called from that city to Ulm to take up a post at Ulm Cathedral in August 1699. There he assisted and frequently substituted for the cathedral organist S.A. Scherer and, on the latter's death on 26 August 1712, succeeded him. Schneider also directed the collegium musicum in Ulm. During much of his career he was responsible for the care and rebuilding of the cathedral organ. His Passionsmusik (lost) was performed in Ulm in June 1725. Schneider's only known works are his six-volume Clavier-Übung, bestehend in Allemanden, Couranten, Sarabanden, Doubles, Menuets, Trio, Passepieds, Giques (Augsburg, 1732–41) and a cantata Du Friedensfürst, Herr Jesu Christ, for four voices and strings (F-Sm, according to EitnerQ).

A son, Georg Ludwig (also known as Sartori), was employed in Mannheim in 1747 as a violinist and later as a flautist.

GEORGE J. BUELOW

Schneider, Franz (b Pulkau, bap. 2 Oct 1737; d Melk, 5 Feb 1812). Austrian composer and organist. After holding a number of minor posts as an organist in Lower Austrian towns, he became a pupil of J.G. Albrechtsberger at Maria Taferl in 1757. He accompanied his teacher to Melk, where he was appointed organist first at the parish church in 1760 and then, as Albrechtsberger's successor, at the Benedictine abbey in January 1766. Performing additional duties as music director after 1787, he remained in the service of the Benedictines in Melk for half a century.

Copies of Schneider's music, particularly the masses, can be found in considerable numbers in provincial Austrian church archives carrying performance dates as late as 1880. Many of his works demonstrate a sound contrapuntal technique, but he did not attempt to follow Albrechtsberger in elevating counterpoint to a central stylistic position. His liking for the use of solo instruments may have been inspired originally by the influential Krems composer J.G. Zechner, but in later works was the result of the limited forces at Melk.

ROBERT N. FREEMAN

Schneider, Georg Abraham (b Darmstadt, 19 April 1770; d Berlin, 19 Jan 1839). German horn player, oboist and composer. He studied several instruments with J.W. Mangold, violinist in the Darmstadt court orchestra, which he himself joined at the age of 17. He then learnt theory and composition with J.G. Portmann, whose daughter Caroline, a notable singer, he later married. He left Darmstadt in 1795 to join the court orchestra of Prince Heinrich of Prussia in Rheinsberg, where he composed and published many orchestral and chamber works. In 1803 he joined the royal orchestra in Berlin and began to make his name as a horn virtuoso and composer; he founded a series of subscription concerts in 1807 and in 1818 the Musikalische Übungsakademie zur Bildung der Liebhaber. On Kotzebue's invitation he became conductor of his theatre in Reval (now Tallinn) in 1813, retaining his Berlin post and returning to it in 1816. In Berlin his appointments included music director of the Königliche Schauspiele (1820) and Royal Prussian Kapellmeister (1825), in which post he devoted himself to the conducting of operas. He also taught at the music school attached to the royal theatre and in the Prussian Academy of Arts, retiring in 1838.

Schneider's large output is unexceptional stylistically, being marked by all the conventions of the late 18th century; but it is remarkable for the virtuosity of his instrumental writing, which proves the extent of his own mastery of many instruments. He was apparently the first to compose a work including the newly invented valve horn, in his Concertino for three hunting horns and valve horn (1818). His instrumental music, theatre and ballet music found more recognition during his lifetime than his five Singspiele, Der Orakelspruch, Aucassin und Nicolette, Die Verschworenen, Der Traum and Der Werwolf.

Schneider's son Louis (b Berlin, 29 April 1805; d Potsdam, 16 Dec 1878) was a writer and actor, and privy councillor and tutor to Friedrich Wilhelm IV. He is remembered for his Geschichte der Oper und des königlichen Opernhauses in Berlin (Berlin, 1852, with suppl. Geschichte der kurfürstlich Brandenburgischen und königlich Preussischen Kapelle). He also published three volumes of memoirs as Aus meinem Leben (Berlin, 1879).

WILLIAM J. ROGAN

Schneider, Hans (b Eichstätt, 23 Feb 1921). German antiquarian dealer, publisher and bibliographer. He founded his antiquarian business at Tutzing near Munich in 1949, issuing a number of catalogues each year. Several of these have become useful works of reference on individual composers, including Brahms, Mozart, Paganini and Schumann, while an innovative series devoted to individual publishers, including Schott, André and Universal Edition, has also been produced. By 1998 the firm had issued over 350 antiquarian catalogues, usually devoted to one of three specialist areas: important manuscripts and letters, first and early editions, and music literature. Through its prolific but scrupulously detailed catalogues, the firm established itself as one of the most important in postwar Europe.

In 1958 Schneider founded a publishing house which has produced some fine facsimiles such as Beethoven's Missa solemnis (Kyrie only) and Brahms's Clarinet Trio. A significant aspect of the firm's activity has been the publication of scholarly series such as the pioneering Musikbibliographische Arbeiten guides to the first editions of composers from Mozart to Messiaen. Other series include Orff-Dokumentation (8 vols.), a catalogue of music in the Hoboken Collection (A-Wn) and Komponisten in Bayern (30 vols. to 1998). Fritz Stieger's 11-volume Opernlexikon, one of the monumental reference works of music for the theatre, was published by the firm; it has also issued thematic catalogues for Bruckner, Paganini, Spohr and others.

As an author, Schneider has written the definitive studies of three German music publishers from the 18th and early 19th centuries: Bossler, Falter and Götz.

Schneider, Herbert (b Wiesbaden, 23 March 1941). German musicologist. After studying musicology in Mainz and Nancy with Federhofer and Wellek, he took the doctorate at Mainz University with a dissertation on French 17th-century music theory. After completing his Habilitation on Lully in 1978, he was professor at the universities of Mainz (1979–81), Bayreuth (1981–4), Heidelberg (1984–93), the Musikhochschule in Frankfurt (1993–6) and was visiting professor at the Sorbonne and Ecole Normale Supérieure in Paris. He was appointed to the chair of musicology at Saarbrücken University in 1996; in that year he was made a Chevalier of the Ordre des Arts et Lettres. He is editor of the series Musikwissenschaftliche Publikationen. His principal areas of research are French opera (Lully, Rameau, Auber) and popular song (the vaudeville) from the 17th to the 19th century.

CHRISTIAN BERGER

Schneider, Hortense (Catherine-Jeanne [Caroline-Jeanne]) (b Bordeaux, 30 April 1833; d Paris, 6 May 1922). French soprano. She made her professional début in 1853 at Agen, as Inès in La favorite, and she first appeared in Paris at the Bouffes-Parisiens on 31 August 1855 in a double bill including Offenbach's Le violoneux. The following year she sang in Tromb-al-ca-zar and La rose de St-Flour by Offenbach, and Les pantins de Violette by Adam. She appeared at the Variétés for two seasons and then from 1858 to 1864 at the Palais-Royal, singing in countless ephemeral comedies, vaudevilles and melodramas. She had decided to leave the stage when Offenbach persuaded her to return to the Variétés for La belle Hélène (1864); her triumphant success as Helen was equalled by her Boulotte in Barbe-bleue (1866) and even surpassed in La Grande-duchesse de Gérolstein (1867), which drew enormous crowds, including nearly every crowned head in Europe, throughout the Exhibition year. A visit to London was followed by La Périchole (1868) and La diva (1869), but the Franco-Prussian War brought an end both to the Second Empire and to the moral climate in which the great Offenbach operettas had flourished. Schneider sang in St Petersburg (1872) and in Paris for a few more years and then retired. Her personal attractions and the scandal of her private life were as important to her success as her voice, which was small though well projected; she also had superb enunciation and genuine talent as an actress.

ELIZABETH FORBES

Schneider, Johann (b Oberlauter, nr Coburg, bap. 17 July 1702; d Leipzig, 5 Jan 1788). German organist and composer. The son of a miller, he first studied singing and keyboard with the local Kantor, Nikolaus Müller, and later (*c*1717–20) keyboard and composition with Johann Heinrich Reinmann in Saalfeld. Presumably during this latter period Schneider was also a keyboard student of J.S. Bach in Cöthen as well as a violin pupil of J.G. Graun in Merseburg and Johann Graf in Rudolstadt. In 1721 he became organist and first violinst at the Saalfeld court, and in 1726 violinist at the ducal chapel in Weimar. In 1729 he successfully auditioned for the organ post at the Nikolaikirche in Leipzig against eight other candidates including the Bach pupil J.C. Vogler and the alleged Bach pupil J.A. Scheibe (Bach was one of the examiners); he held this position from August 1730 to 1787. From 1746 to 1748 Schneider played second violin and harpischord for the Leipzig Grosse Concert, which he may also have directed from the keyboard. According to Marianne Helms (Kritischer Bericht to Neue Bach-Ausgabe, V/viii, 1981) Schneider may be the scribe known in the Bach literature as Anonymous 5, who in 1723–4 worked as a copyist for Bach in Leipzig. If so, he probably also studied under Bach in Leipzig during these years.

In 1747 Lorenz Mizler said of Schneider's organ playing that 'except for Mr Bach you will not hear anything better in Leipzig'. Such a comment may reflect the considerable technical demands (for example rapid manual and pedal figuration and, in the trios, wide hand-crossings) posed by Schneider's extant organ compositions. For the most part, these works represent late Baroque style, although the Prelude in G is an unambiguous specimen of the galant style . The Prelude in G minor features bold harmonies in the context of French overture style, while the Prelude in D employs bravura passage-work along the lines of a free toccata; the three organ fugues display a solid contrapuntal technique. In the trio on Mein Gott, das Herze bring ich dir Schneider, most unusually, states the chorale tune twice, the second time an octave lower, and achieves a modern, chamber-music idiom not unlike that of his teacher Bach's 'Schübler' chorales. The two settings of Vater unser im Himmelreich, on the other hand, adopt the traditional forms of the melody chorale and cantus firmus chorale respectively.

RUSSELL STINSON

Schneider, Marius (b Hagenau, Alsace, 1 July 1903; d Marquartstein, 10 July 1982). German musicologist. He studied philology and musicology at the universities of Strasbourg and Paris and the piano with Cortot, taking the doctorate under Wolf at Berlin University (1930) with a dissertation on the 14th-century Ars Nova. He was Hornbostel's assistant at the Berlin Phonogramm-Archiv (1932–4) and in 1934 succeeded him as director. In 1937 the government objected to his Habilitation at Berlin University. After military service during World War II he was appointed (1944) founder and director of the department for ethnomusicology at the Instituto Español de Musicología, Barcelona; later he became a lecturer at the Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Cientificas at Barcelona University (1947–55). In 1955 his Habilitationsschrift on the history of polyphony was accepted by the University of Cologne, where he taught comparative musicology and ethnomusicology (1955–68); after his retirement he taught at the University of Amsterdam (1968–70).

Schneider was directed to the study of the early Middle Ages by Wolf, and his examination of the origins and history of vocal polyphony led him to various extra-European sources. From a systematic comparison of many music examples from different regions and cultures he derived important conclusions concerning the principles of polyphonic techniques, their worldwide distribution and their historical relationships (see Geschichte der Mehrstimmigkeit, 1934). He was particularly interested in polyphonic phenomena in the vocal music of Africa and the Caucasus, and also studied the relationship between written music in early European manuscripts and surviving folk music traditions, and common traits of different musical cultures in the Mediterranean area including the Near East. Other studies were concerned with the music of specific regions or ethnic groups (Philippines, Mato Grosso, Cameroon, Australia, Assam, Tunisia and especially Spain). His research was always directed to the phenomenology and fundamentals of musical processes; his methodological position in comparative musicology and ethnomusicology was also expressed in basic contributions to handbooks and encyclopedias. In his last years Schneider was increasingly interested in the meaning and function of music in the context of philosophy, mythology and religion throughout the world, and contributed to a deeper understanding of the role of music in the study of symbols and cosmology. His ideas stimulated discussions and controversies among colleagues and students on an international basis, and he greatly influenced the younger generation of his 'Cologne school', which succeeded the 'Berlin school' of Hornbostel.

ROBERT A. GÜNTHER

Schneider, Max (b Eisleben, 20 Sept 1875; d Halle, 5 May 1967). German music historian. He studied musicology with Kretzschmar and Riemann at Leipzig University and composition with Jadassohn. After serving as Kapellmeister in Halle (1897–1901) he resumed his historical studies with Kretzschmar, following him to Berlin in 1904, where he took the doctorate in 1917 with a dissertation on the beginnings of the basso continuo. From 1907 to 1914 he worked as assistant librarian at the Royal Library (now the Deutsche Staatsbibliothek) in Berlin and taught orchestration at the Berlin Church Music Institute, where he was appointed professor in 1913. In 1915 he accepted a professorship at Breslau University, succeeding Otto Kinkeldey. In 1928 he succeeded Schering as professor of musicology at Halle University, where he remained until his retirement in 1960. He was also co-editor of Archiv für Musikwissenschaft (1918–27), co-editor of the Händel-Jahrbuch (1955–67), the Hallische Händel-Ausgabe (from 1955) and the series Musikgeschichte in Bildern (with Heinrich Besseler, from 1961). Honoured by three Festschriften he was respected as the doyen of German musicology for more than two decades.

Schneider's main field of interest and research, as reflected in his numerous publications, was almost exclusively the history of music from the late 16th century to the mid-18th. Within this area his main concerns were questions of performing practice and problems of sources, printed or manuscript. Of particular significance are his contributions to Bach research which included some major bibliographical, archival and source-material studies as well as exemplary editions.

CHRISTOPH WOLFF

Schneider, Michael (b Weimar, 4 March 1909; d Cologne, 26 Nov 1994). German organist and church musician. From 1927 to 1930 he studied church music at the Weimar Musikhochschule and the Leipzig Institute of Church Music, and later musicology at the universities of Jena and Munich. In 1940 he took the doctorate at Cologne University with a dissertation on German organ technique in the early 19th century. He was the town organist and a lecturer at the Musikhochschule at Weimar (1931–4), then until 1936 principal organist and Kantor at the Matthäuskirche in Munich and a lecturer at the Akademie der Tonkunst. In 1936 he became a professor and head of the department of evangelical church music at the Cologne Musikhochschule. He conducted the Berlin Kantorei, whose performances included cycles of Bach cantatas, and the Berlin Bruckner Choir (1941–5). Schneider then worked in Munich as director of music at the Markuskirche, a lecturer at the Music Academy and conductor of the university chorus. Later he took up posts in Detmold as professor of organ, head of the department of evangelical church music and deputy director at the North-West German Academy of Music. In 1958 he was appointed professor of organ at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, and in 1965 returned to the Cologne Musikhochschule. He gave frequent organ concerts in Germany and abroad and was renowned for his dynamic but flexible style. Although well grounded in tradition, Schneider was also a knowledgeable interpreter of contemporary music, and had works dedicated to him by such composers as David, Höller, Max Baumann and Frank Michael Beyer.

GERHARD WIENKE

Schneider, Paul. See SARTORIUS, PAUL.

Schneider, Peter (b Vienna, 26 March 1939). Austrian conductor. After singing with the Vienna Boys' Choir he studied at the Vienna Music Academy (conducting with Swarowsky). His operatic début was at the Salzburg Landestheater in 1959 (Handel's Giulio Cesare). He worked at Heidelberg from 1961 and was first conductor at the Deutsche Oper am Rhein from 1968, directing operas by Wagner, Mozart, Verdi, Berg and Dallapiccola and a complete Janáček cycle. He has appeared regularly at Bayreuth, conducting Der fliegende Holländer (1981), then Lohengrin (1984) and a Ring cycle (1987). He was music director at Mannheim (1985–7), and has conducted opera in London (Die Zauberflöte, 1986), Madrid, Berlin, Hamburg and Tokyo (Der Rosenkavalier with the company of the Vienna Staatsoper, 1986). He was appointed music director of the Bayerische Staatsoper, Munich, in 1993. Schneider's other repertory includes Fidelio (1994, Turin), Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District and Parsifal.

DAVID CUMMINGS

Schneider, Urs Peter (b Berne, 14 Feb 1939). Swiss composer and pianist. He was a student of Walter Lang (piano) and Sándor Veress (composition) in Berne, attended courses at Darmstadt (1962–3) and studied in Cologne with Pousseur, Rzewski and Stockhausen. He later studied the piano with Seidlhofer. Since 1968 he has conducted the Ensemble Neue Horizonte Bern, a group dedicated to the performance of Swiss and American avant-garde music. He was appointed professor at the Berne Conservatory in 1989 after having taught the piano there for many years. His honours include a soloist's award from the Association des Musiciens Suisses (1966), an Avro Award from Dutch Broadcasting (1970), the Grosser Musikpreis of the canton of Berne (1983) and first prize for improvisation from Musik in Grenzbereichen, Zürich (1987).

Very few of Schneider's early compositions employ 12-note techniques. Babel (1961–7), for optional sound sources and performers, marks the beginning of his concentration on aleatory music. Recorded in notation that includes symbols, verbal directions, graphic figures and coded messages, Babel's 355 sound events create a catalogue of materials and musical actions rather than a work in the traditional sense. In Kirchweih (1964–71), Schneider reduced the musical stimuli to a regular pulse, a series of single tones and tone clusters. In later years, he was influenced by mysticism and the ideas of Rudolf Steiner. While most of his works involve text, they commonly merge the domains of composition, improvisation and concept art, and exploit the various functions of performance and ritual. Every five years, individual pieces were merged into the cycle Studien (1955–94), summarizing particular compositional techniques.

THOMAS GARTMANN

Schneiderhan, Wolfgang (Eduard) (b Vienna, 28 May 1915). Austrian violinist. He was taught by his mother from the age of three, and when he was five made a public début in Vienna. In 1923 he went to Pisek to study with Otakar Ševčík, and later studied with Julius Winkler in Vienna. His international career as a soloist began with a performance of Mendelssohn's concerto in Copenhagen in 1926. He became the first leader of the Vienna SO in 1933, and was appointed to lead the Vienna PO in 1937, the year he formed the Schneiderhan Quartet. In 1951 he left the orchestra and disbanded the quartet to resume his solo career, but continued to play trios with Enrico Mainardi and Edwin Fischer until 1956. He also taught at the Salzburg Mozarteum (1938–56) and at the Vienna Academy of Music (1939–50). In 1949 he succeeded Flesch and Kulenkampff at the Lucerne Conservatory where, in association with his pupil Rudolf Baumgartner, he formed the Lucerne Festival Strings in 1956. He was never a great virtuoso, but his performances were distinguished by his stylistic superiority and sensibly balanced artistry in Viennese works, especially Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert; he also gave fine performances of works by Stravinsky, Martin and Henze. In the 1970s he extended his activities to conducting, giving Franz Schmidt's opera Notre Dame at the Vienna Volksoper in 1975. He married the soprano Irmgard Seefried in 1948, and gave many concerts with her.

GERHARD BRUNNER/R

Schneider-Siemssen, Günther (b Augsburg, 7 June 1926). Austrian scene designer of German birth. He was guided to study scene design by Clemens Krauss, through whom he gained early experience in scene painting at the Staatsoper in Munich, where he studied with Sievert, Preetorius and Rudolf Hartmann. From 1947 to 1954 he designed for theatres and films in Berlin, Munich and Salzburg. In 1952 he began his 20-year association with the Salzburg marionette theatre, eventually revolutionizing the design of the puppet stage and creating several new productions of Mozart operas. In 1954 he was named chief of design at the Bremen Staatstheater, where he designed his first Ring. After collaborating with Karajan on Pelléas et Mélisande at the Vienna Staatsoper in 1960 he became Karajan's personal adviser on production, moving in 1962 to Vienna where he was appointed chief designer for the Staatsoper, the Burgtheater and the Volksoper. He made his Covent Garden début in 1962 designing Peter Ustinov's production of Schoenberg's Erwartung, and then designed the Ring directed by Hotter and conducted by Solti (1962–4). With Karajan he worked on numerous productions for the Salzburg festivals including Boris Godunov (1965), Don Giovanni (1967), Otello (1969), the Ring (1967–70, later given in modified form in New York), Fidelio (1971) and Tristan und Isolde (1972). He also designed Le nozze di Figaro at La Scala in 1973 and Jenůfa at the Metropolitan Opera in 1974.

His designs, particularly for Wagner, are outstanding for the epic, cosmic world they create on stage. Light and projection in sweeping, swirling patterns evoke with powerful symbolism a universe that coincides perfectly with the visions of the directors with whom he has most often worked: Karajan, August Everding and Otto Schenk. In 1988 Schneider-Siemssen's second Metropolitan Ring was completed. Harking back to the Bayreuth 1897 production, though criticized by some for being over-pretty and reactionary, it created a sensational effect, contrasting with the modern interpretative trend among directors and designers. Schenk's romantic fairy-tale conception was produced using all the stage machinery and lighting equipment available to the modern theatre. The following year Schneider-Siemssen and Everding created an entirely different, modern-dress Ring for the Wielki Theatre in Warsaw, the first time the complete cycle had been given in Poland. Among many other notable productions Schneider-Siemssen designed are Dvořák's Armida (1961, Bremen), Palestrina (1964, Vienna), La fanciulla del West (1982, Berlin), Les contes d'Hoffmann (1982, Metropolitan) and Un re in ascolto (1984, Salzburg).

PAUL SHEREN

Schneider-Trnavský [Schneider], Mikuláš (b Trnava, 24 May 1881; d Bratislava, 28 May 1958). Slovak composer and choirmaster. Between 1900 and 1905 he studied composition at the conservatories of Budapest (with Koessler), Vienna (with Grädener) and Prague (with Stecker). From 1909 until his death he was choirmaster of Trnava Cathedral; after the creation of independent Czechoslovakia in 1918 he was also involved in concert and educational activities and worked as a music school inspector. In 1956 he was awarded the title National Artist.

His instinctive talent and melodic inventiveness found expression in a musical style that was similar to Dvořák's, particularly in chamber works such as the Violin Sonata in G minor and Dumka a tanec ('Dumka and Dance'). His duties as choirmaster and as a musician in a provincial town meant that he focussed on sacred and incidental music, despite harbouring greater ambitions. He composed a number of accomplished liturgical works and compiled Jednotný katolícky spevník ('The Standard Catholic Hymnbook'), a work of historical importance which contained Romantic harmonizations contrary to Cecilianist asceticism (unlike other central European hymnals of the period) and remained in use after his death. From the time of his membership of Slovak student unions in Vienna and Prague, Schneider-Trnavský was also an arranger of folksongs; his preference was for popular, more contemporary urban forms, which he set with great sensitivity. His art songs, which were to prove popular in their own right, are folk inspired and contain elements of the German lied tradition.

VLADIMÍR ZVARA

Schnell (Ger.: 'rapid', 'swift', 'fast'). A tempo mark in common use since the 19th century in German scores, faster than bewegt but equivalent to a fast ALLEGRO; it is often used with qualifications such as Sehr schnell (molto allegro) or So schnell wie möglich (Schumann, Piano Sonata in G minor) that imply PRESTO. Bruckner gave the finale of his Second Symphony the tempo designation mehr schnell ('more fast') at the opening; later it becomes sehr schnell.

DAVID FALLOWS

Schnell, Johann Jakob (b 1687; d Bamberg, 21 Feb 1754). German instrumentalist and composer. From 1714 he was oboist and violinist to the Prince-Bishop of Bamberg, and on 1 July 1727 was appointed by Lothar Franz to direct the court chamber music. With this move began Schnell's effectiveness as representative of the era of the Schönborn family in Franconia. His opp.1 and 8 comprise nine cycles of sacred works and his other opus numbers are court and chamber music. He described his orchestral masses (a title which indicates that they were innovations) as difficult; they contained concerto-style sonatas to accompany the epistle. The three Vespers op.8 are graded as 'solennes', 'breves' and 'brevissimae' and in the preface three more vespers are promised, though it is not known whether he wrote them. For the Violin Concertos op.3 and the Neue Parthien op.9 Schnell used the same small group of instruments as for his church music (strings, with two trumpets or horns). He furnished op.2 with a diagram and fingering for flute and op.3 with a diagram and fingering for the high soloists. Among his works are many flute trios, a genre with which Count Rudolf had become particularly well acquainted during his studies in Rome in 1693, largely owing to his acquaintance with Corelli; Schnell's are fresh and inventive, while his chamber music shows his special mastery of the intimate form. The economies made necessary by the success of the Schönborns' Baroque architecture were turned by Schnell into a virtue, while the majesty of the full-size orchestra was reserved for his successors. In 1738 he also took up publishing.

Other Schnells active in Germany may have been related to Johann Jakob. Judas Thaddäus Schnell (b Wangen, before 1550; d Füssen, 25 Aug 1619) was a south German choir director and church composer. In the decades before the Thirty Years War he was in charge of musical activities in the Benedictine abbey of St Mang in Füssen. Three of his compositions are extant (in D-Rp and Mbs). Bernhard Schnell (fl 1704) was probably the father of Johann Jakob Schnell. He assisted Count Rudolf in Wiesentheid, Lower Franconia, in founding his collection of instruments. Another Johann Jakob (Jean Jacques) Schnell (b Vaihingen, Württemberg, 1740) started as a carpenter's apprentice, but by 1760 was making pianos and organs with Gessinger in Rothenburg. He later spent six years with Dulcken in the Netherlands. In 1777 he was in Paris, first making harpsichords for the Countess of Artois and then as court instrument maker to the king. He built an anémocorde ('wind-piano', see SOSTENENTE PIANO, §2) which was bought by Marie Antoinette. After five years' military service in France he started a piano shop in Ludwigsburg, and in 1799 demonstrated his anémocorde in Vienna and sold it to a London surgeon, Robert Robertson, in 1803. Johann Christoph Schnell (fl 1788) was either a brother or a son of the later Johann Jakob Schnell. In 1788 he settled in Zweibrücken as a keyboard instrument maker.

Schnitger, Arp (b Schmalenfleth, Oldenburg, bap. 2 July 1648; bur. Neuenfelde, nr Hamburg, 28 July 1719). German organ builder. He learned joinery from his father, also named Arp, and in 1666 was apprenticed to his uncle, Berendt Huss of Glückstadt in Holstein. With him Schnitger built the large three-manual organ at the Cosmaekirche, Stade (1668–75, enlarged by Schnitger in 1688; restored 1972–5 by Ahrend); after Huss's death in 1676 Schnitger fulfilled many of the former's outstanding contracts, completing the instrument at St Wilhadi, Stade and building new organs at Cappel (1680; restored 1977 by the Beckerath) and Lüdingworth (1682–3; restored 1981–2 by Ahrend). In 1682 Schnitger received the contract to build an organ for the Nikolaikirche Hamburg, and moved his workshop from Stade to Hamburg. This organ, built between 1682 and 1687, was the largest new instrument built by Schnitger and tragically was destroyed by fire in 1842 (for the stop list, see ORGAN, §V, 6, Table 13). Schnitger was assisted in his work by two of his four sons, Johann Jürgen (Georg) (bap. 4 Sept 1690; d after 1733) and Franz Caspar (1693–1729; see below).

Schnitger was the most important organ builder in northern Europe during the Baroque period. His organs are valued for their elegant speech, the fine harmonic proportion between fundamental and overtones, the quality of the reed stops, the ability of principals and reeds to blend together and the wide variety of flute stops. His organs carried on the north German tradition of independent divisions (Rückpositiv, Hauptwerk, Brustpositiv, Oberwerk, and Pedal), each with a fully-developed choir of principals, reeds, and flutes. Schnitger often incorporated stops from earlier builders into his new organs, especially the lower-pitched flue stops (16′, 8′, and 4′) that had been built in the Renaissance or early Baroque periods, and with his brilliant mixtures and fundamental-rich reeds he succeeded in creating an organ style that not only successfully met the need to accompany congregational singing, but inspired a flourishing school of North German organ composers.

Schnitger's firm built over 170 instruments, including several organs with four manuals, 26 three-manual organs, and more than 20 large two-manual organs with independent pedal divisions. He also built more than 30 domestic organs. His instruments for the churches of northern Germany's Hanseatic cities were the largest of the time; his instruments were exported to locations as far afield as Russia, England, Spain and Portugal. Many of his organs have been destroyed by fire or war, and many were subsequently modified by other builders. His surviving instruments are found primarily in the coastal region of northern Germany between Hamburg and Groningen. In addition to those organs discussed above, they include Stade, St Cosnae (1668–75; restored 1972–5 by Ahrend); Cappel (1680; restored 1977 by von Beckerath); Lüdingworth (1682–3; restored 1981–2 by Ahrend); Steinkirchen (1685–87; restored 1947–8, 1987 by von Beckerath); Norden (1686–92; restored 1981–5 by Ahrend); Hamburg-Neuenfelde (1682–8); Jacobikirche Hamburg (1689–93; restored 1990–93 by Ahrend); Martinikerk, Groningen (1691–2; restored 1977/84 by Ahrend); Pelstergasthuiskerk, Groningen (1693; restored 1989–90 by Bakker & Timmenga); Grasberg (1693–4; restored 1980–85 by W. Hillebrand); Harkstede (1695–6); Noordbroek (1695–6; rebuilt by Freytag in 1808; restored to Freytag condition in 1958 by C. Edskes and S. Graafhuis); Mensingeweer (1696–8); Dedesdorf (1697–8; restored 1998 by A. Führer); Nieuw Scheemda (1698; restored 1968 by B. Edskes); Ganderkesee (1699; restored 1966 by A. Führer); Uithuizen (1700–01; Ruckpositiv restored 1987 by B. Edskes); Aa-Kerk, Groningen (1700–02; additions by Timpe, 1830 and van Oeckelen, 1857); Mariana, Brazil (1701; restored 1988–9 by B. Edskes); Faro, Portugal (1701); Godlinze (1704; restored 1986 by Reil Bros.); Eenum (1704; restored 1987 by Reil Bros.); Weener (1709–10; restored 1978–82 by Ahrend); and Pellworm (1711; restored 1990 by Hillebrand Bros.).

Arp Schnitger perhaps influenced 20th-century organ building more than any other organ builder of earlier centuries. His second-largest organ, for the Jacobikirche, Hamburg, was a crucial model for the Orgelbewegung, and recordings of Helmut Walcha performing Bach on the Cappel organ, made during the 1950s, brought the Schnitger sound to a wide circle of performers, teachers and builders.

During his lifetime Schnitger employed a large number of apprentices, who tended to work quasi-independently from shops established in various cities. His successors carried on his style for several generations in Germany and the Netherlands. About 50 students worked or trained with him; many went on to establish independent workshops, continuing to build organs in the Schnitger style. In Germany the tradition was carried on by Christian Vater (Hanover), Lambert Daniel Kastens (Itzehoe and Copenhagen), Hans Hantelmann (Lübeck), Matthias Dropa (Lüneburg), Erasmus Bielfeldt (Bremen) and Johann Matthias Naumann (Hildesheim), among others, and, in the next generation, by Johann Hinrich Klapmeyer (Glückstadt), Johann Dietrich Busch (Iztehoe) and Dietrich Christoph Gloger (Stade).

In the Netherlands, Schnitger's work was carried on by his son, Franz Caspar (i) (b Hamburg, bap. 15 Oct 1693; bur. Zwolle, 5 Mar 1729). He worked with his father from as early as 1709–10, when he helped build the organ in the Georgskirche, Weener. After Arp's death he and his brother, Johann Jürgen, moved the organ building shop to Zwolle, where they completed the three-manual, 46-stop organ for Zwolle's Grote or Michaelskerk in 1719–21 (restored 1953–6 by D.A. Flentrop). During the next ten years Franz Caspar (i) built or rebuilt organs in Zwolle (Lutheran Church), Vollenhove, Deventer, Meppel, Harderwijk, Alkmaar and Groningen. He died before completing the rebuilding of the organ in the Martinikerk, Groningen; the work was finished by his master journeyman, ALBERT ANTHONI HINSZ, who married his widow in 1732 and took over the business, working with Franz Caspar Schnitger (ii); after Hinsz's death, Franz Caspar (ii) was joined by H.H. Freytag, who was succeeded in turn by his son H.E. Freytag, with whose death in 1869 the direct link with the workshop of Arp Schnitger ceased. Other Dutch students of Schnitger include Rudolf Garrelts, Johan Radeker and Matthias Amoor.

LYNN EDWARDS

Schnittelbach, Nathanael (b Danzig, 16 June 1633; d Lübeck, 16 Nov 1667). German violinist and composer. His first appointment, not a permanent one, was as violinist at the Marienkirche, Danzig. At the age of 20 he joined the orchestra of Queen Christina of Sweden, but two years later, early in 1655, he returned to Germany as civic musician at Lübeck. He received the freedom of the city on 13 November of the same year and on 11 December married a daughter of the civic musician Nicolaus Bleyer with whom he studied the violin from 1655 until Bleyer's death in 1658. Gerber called Schnittelbach 'one of the greatest violinists of the seventeenth century'. He was known throughout Germany and in Poland, Denmark, Holland and Sweden and was likewise respected as a teacher; his most famous pupil was N.A. Strungk. He became ill while taking part in festivities celebrating a court wedding at Gottorf in October 1667 and died a month later. Little of his music survives. Two suites for instrumental ensemble in E minor and C minor (S-Uu, inc.; 1 ed. in Organum, iii/17, Lippstadt, n.d.), are typical of civic music of the time and probably date from his years in Lübeck. A Sonata for violin and basso continuo survives at Durham (GB-DRc). He is also known to have written a Magnificat for five voices and two violins (formerly D-Lm) and a sacred concerto Wo der Herr nicht das Haus bauet (formerly ? St Magni, Brunswick).

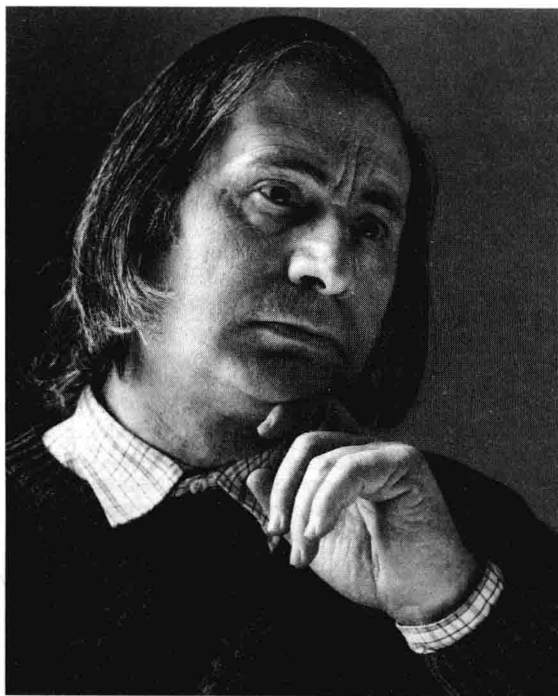
Schnittke [Shnitke], Alfred (Garriyevich) (b Engels, 24 Nov 1934; d Hamburg, 3 Aug 1998). Russian composer.



1. LIFE. Alfred Schnittke first studied privately in Vienna (1946–8), where his father was working; this decisive experience was to have a decisive effect on his work as a composer since this exposure to the Austro-German cultural tradition fundamentally influenced his future tastes and approach to form and vocabulary throughout his career. On his return to Russia, Schnittke studied in the Choirmasters' Department at the October Revolution Music College in Moscow (1949–53) as well as studying theory privately with Iosif Rïzhkin. He later enrolled at the Moscow Conservatory (1953–8, and as a postgraduate 1958–61), where his teachers were Yevgeny Golubev and Nikolay Rakov. Schnittke later observed that his own 'polystylism' could be traced to the filling of gaps in his musical knowledge during these years. He himself taught instrumentation at the Conservatory for a decade from 1962, and from this time worked as a freelance composer, writing for the theatre and for film as well as concert works. Between 1962 and 1984 he wrote a total of 66 film scores for Mosfilm and other Soviet film companies: this aspect of his life was to have an important technical influence upon his career as a concert composer. During the course of his life he also wrote a large number of articles concerning various issues in contemporary music, and lectured extensively in Russia and Germany.

Though Schnittke's growing reputation permitted him numerous journeys abroad from the 1980s onwards, before then his trips outside the Soviet Union had been restricted to one in 1967 to hear Dialogue in Warsaw and another in 1977 to Germany and Austria, as a keyboard player with the Lithuanian Chamber Orchestra. His inevitably complicated relationship with the Soviet regime began with the condemnation of his oratorio Nagasaki by the Union of Composers in 1958. He was subsequently well-treated by the Union, and received commissions from the Ministry of Culture and from two opera companies, but when he was asked to conform to a less experimentalist ideal after completing his second opera – 'African Ballad' – he no longer enjoyed official approval. Due to the more liberal attitude of the Krushchyov era, Schnittke and other young composers saw formerly sanctioned scores by Western composers; he was thus able to analyze in great detail not only the music of Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Berg and Webern, but also Stockhausen, Nono and Ligeti. These analyses led to his abandonment of serial techniques. At the same time, however, he was constantly attacked in official publications such as Sovetskaya muzïka. After its première in Gor′kiy in 1974, his First Symphony was to all intents and purposes banned from performance in the wake of Khrennikov's blanket condemnation of it. This situation changed only when Gorbachyov came to power in 1985.

It was precisely from this time onwards, when, paradoxically, he was finally able to travel to attend performances of his works outside the Soviet Union, that Schnittke began to be plagued by health problems, beginning with a serious stroke in June that year. A second occurred in 1991, a year after he had moved to Hamburg, where he was teaching composition as the Hochschule für Musik und Theater, and from that point on Schnittke's music became more austere and more obviously concerned with mortality. He suffered another stroke in 1994, but did not cease to compose; he died in 1998 in his adopted city of Hamburg.

Later in life Schnittke was the recipient of numerous international prizes and awards, including the Russian State Prize (twice, in 1986 and 1995) and awards from Austria, Germany and Japan. He was made a member of the Academies of Arts of Munich, Stockholm, Hamburg, Berlin and London, and given honorary membership of several others.

2. WORKS. In Schnittke's early works, Shostakovich was an obvious model, but many other influences were also absorbed. In the oratorio Nagasaki (1958, written just after he had graduated from the Moscow Conservatory), both the vocabulary and rhetoric of the Russian tradition of the 19th century are still clearly felt, notwithstanding an atonal episode representing the explosion of the atomic bomb. An absorption of new techniques followed intensive research into Western music and this led, after intensive concentration on serial writing (evident in the Violin Sonata no.1, 1963, and Violin Concerto 1966), to such works as the Violin Sonata ('Quasi una sonata') and the Serenade, both of 1968, which employ aleatory and extended instrumental techniques with wit and humour, and whose sense of openness to all styles and sound-phenomena presage his later, more consistent use of polystylism. The Concerto for Oboe, Harp and Strings (1971) continues to employ elements of the rather fragmented style of the Serenade, but melds them into a taut dramatic structure which moves towards the stasis of the work's final section.

Despite the inherent risk in polystylism of appearing, in formal terms, to be mere pastiche unless disparate stylistic elements are adequately incorporated within the music's aesthetic and physical structure, this approach proved in general to be an efficient generator of that kind of alienation, expressed through irony, which Schnittke inherited from Shostakovich, whose natural successor he has often been considered to be. The Piano Quintet of 1976 (later reworked as the orchestral In memoriam) juxtaposes non-tonal material with nostalgic reminiscences of other types of music (a Viennese waltz, for example) in such a way as to make the feeling of isolation and bereavement almost unbearably acute. In memoriam relies heavily on the emotional, associative power of the strings (in contrast to the fragmented style of the Concerto), a harking back to Tchaikovsky and Mahler which continued in his symphonies.

1977 saw the composition of the Concerto Grosso no.1, in which the wit inherent in the Serenade is developed into a commentary on the idea of the Baroque concerto grosso. The composer noted that he achieved an alienating effect through "formulae and forms of baroque music; free chromaticism and micro-intervals; and banal popular music which enters as it were from the outside with a disruptive effect." Quotation of material of very diverse origins is an important feature of several of his works; he developed this particularly in the film music which he wrote throughout his life. Many of his concert works utilize material first heard in his film scores (the Concerto Grosso no.1 is no exception, using as it does material from Butterfly, a cartoon score).

Schnittke's chamber music, as well as being a vehicle for his most intimate thoughts, also served as a kind of laboratory for refining procedures which were then used on a larger scale in other works. The First String Quartet (1966), whose movements have deceptively traditional titles, employs freely imitative polyphonic writing and a free dodecaphonic vocabulary which is contradicted by the pronounced emphasis of C at the beginning and end as well as during the course of the piece: Schnittke's approach to twelve-note writing was always unorthodox.

The later 1970s saw a gradual abandoning of the rather obvious kind of polystylism of the previous decade, and works such as the First Sonata for cello and piano (1978) and the four Hymns (1974–9) show the creation of a new, homogeneous language with a structural rigour which retains the capacity to allude to other music in more subtle ways than direct quotation. Although the Second String Quartet (1980) is built almost entirely upon medieval Russian sacred music which is quoted relatively clearly in the outer movements, the already idiosyncratic harmonic and melodic character of the quoted material is refracted and distorted in the second and third movements as though it formed a part of Schnittke's own language. Similarly, the Third String Quartet (1983) takes as its material three quotations: cadential material from Lassus's Stabat mater, the theme from Beethoven's Grosse Fuge and Shostakovich's DSCH motto. The chromatic juxtaposition of the latter two provides a foil for the simplicity of the Lassus fragment with which the work begins; all three themes undergo a gradual transformation and reconciliation in Schnittke's own musical language. In the String Trio (1985), a homage to Berg, Schnittke refers to the older composer's style in a general way, rather than using specific quotation, the whole being a complex set of variations or transformations of the opening material. Its polyphonic density is shared by the Fourth String Quartet and the Piano Quartet (both 1989, the latter incorporating material from an unfinished piano quartet by Mahler). Later chamber works, in common with the symphonies, reveal a greater textural transparency. This is apparent, for example, in both the Second Sonata for cello and piano (1993–4) and the Third Sonata for violin and piano (1994).

In his symphonies, Schnittke attempted to take on the Mahlerian symphonic ideal, that of embracing the world. The First (1972), like the Third (1980) builds its universe from a very wide range of material. The First Symphony takes the principles of the contemporary Serenade much further, and in doing so it can be seen as a pivotal point in Schnittke's output between the relatively conventional serial path he had been following and the unequivocal inception of polystylism. In no other work has the conflict of styles and quotations been so clear and so penetrating. Music by Beethoven, Haydn, Grieg, Chopin, Tchaikovsky and Johann Strauss is quoted and brutally interrupted and transmuted, and Jazz is also included in a cadenza for violin and piano. The theatrical element is also important: at the opening there are only three players on stage, the other players then enter gradually and improvise in a chaotic fashion until the conductor signals them to stop. At the end, the musicians leave the stage, as in Haydn's 'Farewell' Symphony, leaving only a solo violin, but then return and begin the work again. They are interrupted by the conductor, who brings the music to an unexpected close.

Though less theatrical, the Third Symphony works with quoted material and stylistic reference in exactly the same way, but the Second (1979) and the Fourth (1983), though referential to other styles, make different use of them. The former, entitled 'St Florian' and an homage to Bruckner, comprises six movements which follow the Ordinary of the Roman Catholic Mass; a chorus and soloists provide the liturgical material upon which the orchestra meditates. In the Fourth, Schnittke said that he strove 'to find the general in the dissimilar', and attempts to reconcile elements of znamenniy and Gregorian chant, the Lutheran chorale and Synagogue cantillation which are intoned by four vocal soloists within a dense, polyphonic orchestral texture. In this work Schnittke succeeds in absorbing his quoted material into the foundations of his own language in an unprecedented way. The culmination of this is found in the Fifth Symphony (1988), which because it is simultaneously the Fourth Concerto grosso, Schnittke could be said to be quoting a quotation. With the sixth, seventh and eighth symphonies (1992, 1993 and 1993–4 respectively) Schnittke entered into a new, sparer sound world, texturally reminiscent of later Shostakovich and late Nono. The Sixth, containing almost no writing for the full orchestra, makes conscious reference both to Bruckner in its trombone chorales and to Schnittke's opera Historia von D. Johann Fausten (1983–94), and the Seventh, while also summoning Bruckner and Mahler, has its point of origin in a solo violin passage recalling Bach and, at times, the Berg of the Violin Concerto. With the Eighth and Ninth Schnittke brought this late, spare style to a new maturity and refinement.

The shadow of Berg may also be detected in Schnittke's own series of violin concertos. The Third (1978) presents an amalgam of violin styles (though often implicity rather than explicitly), and the Fourth (1982) is not only more eclectic but theatrical: towards the end, the orchestra becomes so loud that the soloist cannot be heard, and is left miming the gestures of the virtuoso on stage. With the Konzert zu Dritt of 1994, Schnittke attained the concentrated, lyrical expressionism which would characterize his work thenceforth – confirmed particularly by the Viola Concerto (1985), the ballet Peer Gynt (1986), the Fifth Symphony (1988) and the two cello concertos (1986 and 1990) – until the simplification which occurred with such works as the Sixth Symphony and the opera Zhizn's idiotom ('Life with an Idiot') of the early 1990s.

In his choral music, an obvious vehicle for the expression of religious belief (he was baptized a Roman Catholic in 1982), Schnittke showed himself increasingly a true inheritor of the Russian tradition: whereas in the 1975 Requiem the stylistic links are with Catholic liturgical music, in the Concerto for Mixed Chorus (1984–5) and the Stikhi pokayanniye (1987), stylistic echoes of and technical procedures derived from the 'choral orchestration' of Rachmaninoff abound. It was in his operas that Schnittke dealt with wider philosophical issues, employing a generally angular vocal style but also integrating stylistic reference and allusion in a manner that confirms the theatrical aspirations of his concert works. Life with an Idiot (1991) is a black comedy which while being superficially concerned with the collapse of communism in fact deals with the human condition on a broader scale, something Schnittke underlines by resorting to direct quotation from a great deal of music, including Russian folk songs, within textures of a singular spareness. The Historia von D. Johann Fausten (1983–94), which includes the earlier cantata Seid nüchtern und wachet (1983), may be seen as an operatic passion (a 'negative passion' in Schnittke's words, dealing with the fundamental problem of good and evil), a connection which the composer reinforces with his use of chorales and a pseudo-evangelist, achieving a continuity and a greater stylistic homogeneity absent in Life with an Idiot. Gesualdo (1994) continues these preoccupations and is specifically concerned with the perceived divide between artistic genius and the ability of its possessor to perpetrate the sin of murder; the lean instrumentation of the score results in a textual transparency which goes beyond even Schnittke's other works from his last years.

If the criticism might be made that Schnittke's expressionistic all-inclusiveness could lead to the near-suppression of purely musical argument, this was perhaps inevitable in a composer who was concerned in his music to depict the moral and spiritual struggles of contemporary man in such depth and detail.

IVAN MOODY (text), ALEXANDER IVASHKIN (work-list, bibliography)

Schnitzer. Two German families of instrument makers, both of Munich origin and active in Nuremberg, with no proved relationship to each other. The members of one were Stadtpfeifers and woodwind instrument makers, the others were brass instrument makers.

The founder of the Stadtpfeifer dynasty was Albrecht Schnitzer the elder (b Augsburg; d Munich, 1524 or 1525), whose instruments bore the mark 'A'. He started making instruments in Munich in about 1490, and was a Stadtpfeifer from 1493 until his death. He had at least six sons who were musicians. Sigmund Schnitzer the elder (b Munich; d Nuremberg, between 14 March and 13 June 1557) was installed as a Stadtpfeifer in Nuremberg in 1503, becoming a citizen there in 1507. Hans Schnitzer the elder (b Munich, *c*1486; d Nuremberg, 25 April 1565) was a Stadtpfeifer in Nuremberg between 1506 and 1551. Albrecht Schnitzer the younger was documented in 1521 as a drummer in Nuremberg, where he became a citizen in 1523. Mathes Schnitzer (b Munich, *c*1500; d Nuremberg, 1553) became a Nuremberg Stadtpfeifer in 1522 and a citizen in 1528; he lived in Prague from 1530 until 1532, and in 1534 declined an invitation to go to Munich as a trombonist, instead becoming senior Stadtpfeifer in Nuremberg in 1538, a position he held until his death. He was also known as a trumpeter and woodwind instrument maker, specializing in fifes and cornetts. Arsazius Schnitzer (d Munich, 1557) was a Munich Stadtpfeifer and woodwind instrument maker, and played the trombone. Anton Schnitzer (d Munich, in or before 1544) was also a Munich Stadtpfeifer. Sigmund and Arsazius used the mark 'AA' to distinguish their instruments from those of their father and of their brother Hans, who continued to use his father's single 'A'.

Sigmund the elder's son, Sigmund Schnitzer the younger (d Nuremberg, 7 Dec 1578), was a Stadtpfeifer in Ulm in 1557, but returned to Nuremberg in the same capacity in 1567. Hans the elder had two sons, Veit Schnitzer (fl 1540–55) and Hans Schnitzer the younger (b Nuremberg, *c*1515; d Kassel, before 22 Nov 1566). Veit was a Nuremberg Stadtpfeifer intermittently from 1540 to 1543, and was apparently also an instrument maker, as he obtained a privilege in 1555 from Emperor Charles V to protect his family's mark, which had often been copied by unauthorized persons; after 1547 he was in the emperor's service as a gentleman-at-arms ('Trabant'). Hans the younger, a cornett player and trumpeter, was a Stadtpfeifer in Nuremberg between 15 May 1537 and August 1538, when he moved to Kassel to become a member of the Hofkapelle. Arsazius also had a son named Hans (b Munich, *c*1530; d Munich, 1601), who was a Stadtpfeifer and woodwind instrument maker.

Sigmund the elder was perhaps the most important woodwind instrument maker before Denner. He expanded the family of shawms from the single 'tibia tenor' known to Tinctoris and Virdung (and depicted in two of Hans Burgkmair's woodcuts from Maximilian's Triumphal Procession, *c*1516) to include seven different sizes. He invented the first 16′ bass instrument, the Doppelquint-Basspommer. His son Sigmund the younger specialized in recorders and shawms. Hans the younger appears to have made only recorders. Five instruments bearing the mark 'AA' survive: a tenor recorder, two bass recorders and two cornetts. They were made by Sigmund the younger, Arsazius, or perhaps by Mathes. A bass recorder bearing what appears to be a single 'A' is in the Instrument Museum of the Brussels Conservatory; it was probably made by Albrecht the elder or Hans the elder.

Erasmus Schnitzer (d Nuremberg, bur. 4 Feb 1566), who became a Nuremberg citizen in 1547, is the first Schnitzer known to have made brass instruments; it is not known whether he, too, was a son of Albrecht the elder, nor is his relation to the other Schnitzer brass instrument makers clear. Albrecht the elder's son Anton (see above) was probably the father of Anton Schnitzer the elder (d Nuremberg, 28 March 1608), who established the dynasty of brass instrument makers; he took over the NEUSCHEL workshop on the death of his stepfather, Georg Stengel (called Neuschel), in 1557, and became a citizen of Nuremberg in 1558 and a master in 1562. His son Anton Schnitzer the younger (b Nuremberg, 20 April 1564) became a master in 1591, and other sons Hans Schnitzer (b Nuremberg, 1571; d Vienna, 30 Dec 1609) and Jobst Schnitzer (b Nuremberg, 28 March 1576; d Nuremberg before 1 May 1616) became masters in 1598. Anton the younger's son, Eberhard Schnitzer (b Nuremberg, 13 Feb 1600; d Nuremberg, 9 Dec 1634), became a master in 1620.

Most of the surviving trumpets and trombones of the Schnitzer family are elaborate ceremonial instruments with wide, conical bells characteristic of the period. Of the ten surviving instruments, the most significant are: a tenor trombone made in 1551 by Erasmus, the oldest signed and dated trombone in existence, although it has recently been shown to consist of a trumpet bell with the rest of its components added later (Germanisches Nationalmuseum, Nuremberg; see TROMBONE, fig.5a); a tenor-bass trombone with a crook like the ones illustrated in Mersenne (v, p.271) and Praetorius (pl.viii), made in 1579 (not 1578) by Anton the elder (Accademia Filarmonica, Verona); a tenor trombone by Anton the elder dated 1581 (Nice Conservatoire); a trumpet in modern E♭, silver-plated, with exquisite gold garnishings and elaborate engraving, made in 1581 by Anton the elder (Sammlung alter Musikinstrumente, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna, no.4031); a trumpet pitched slightly sharper than modern E, shaped like a pretzel and containing two medallions with the Bavarian coat of arms in the lateral loops of tubing, made in 1585 by Anton the elder and once belonging to Cesare Bendinelli (Verona collection); a tenor trombone made by Anton the elder or younger and dated 1594 (Edinburgh University collection); a trumpet made in 1598 by Anton the elder or younger (no.181 in the Vienna collection) and identical to the 1585 instrument in Verona but lacking the medallions; and a bass trombone made in 1612 by Jobst, which according to Heyde was provided with a double slide in the mid-19th century (Musikinstrumenten-Museum, University of Leipzig, no.1908, ex de Wit).

Anton the elder was without doubt the greatest master of this Schnitzer family, and one of the most productive; the Munich court alone ordered 12, 24 and 18 trumpets from him in 1567, 1590 and 1592 respectively. His trombones in Verona and Nice display unique single-slide tuning devices. The 1581 trumpet possesses its original mouthpiece, permanently attached to the mouthpipe. Its bore is an enormous 8.3 mm and marks the instrument for use in the principale register.

Schnitzer [Schnizer], Franz (Xaver) (b Wurzach, 13 Dec 1740; d Ottobeuren, 9 May 1785). German composer. He entered the monastery of Ottobeuren in 1760 and studied music under Placidus Christadler and Benedikt Kraus. Schnitzer played K.J. Riepp's new organ at the consecration of the monastery's Dreifaltigkeitskirche (1766), and from 1769 served the abbey as regens chori, organist and music teacher. Regarded by Lipowsky as a first-rate composer, he wrote much sacred music in the Italian style of his time (in A-Wn, D-FS, Mbs, OB) and at least 17 school dramas, now lost, for Ottobeuren (one was also performed in Freising in 1776). He published a set of six keyboard sonatas op.1 (1773) and Cantus ottoburani monasterii (1784).

ADOLF LAYER

Schnitzkius [Schnitzke, Schnitzky], Gregor (b Danzig [now Gdańsk], ?*c*1580; d after 1627). German composer, singer and teacher. Most of our knowledge of his career derives from his publications. In 1603 he described himself as 'musicus et scholae ad St. Johann Collega' in Danzig, and by 1607 he had a post at the Marienschule there. At the same time he was a member of the civic choir at the Marienkirche, where he frequently deputized for the aging Kapellmeister, Johann Wanning. He applied for the post of Kapellmeister when it became vacant in 1603, but he and such notable candidates as Philipp Dulichius and the elder Kaspar Förster (who, like Schnitzkius, was already working in Danzig) were passed over in 1607–8 in favour of Andreas Hakenberger, from the chapel of King Sigismund III of Poland. After Hakenberger's death in 1627, Schnitzkius once more applied unsuccessfully; this time Förster was appointed.

Schnitzkius's works reflect his activities in church and school. The Musices praecepta is a primer for beginners dealing with the rudiments of music in five sections ('Clavis', 'Vox', 'Cantus', 'Mutatio', 'Figura') in both Latin and German. The three sections of the Sacri moduli, which according to the preface were intended for schools and domestic music-making, comprise three-part Latin hymns, and their texts are related symbolically to the number three. Tibi laus, tibi gloria from Sacrarum cantionum exists complete in manuscript; it is an eight-part piece for double chorus in which the treatment of the text is rather conventional.

Schnizer, Franz. See SCHNITZER, FRANZ.

Schnoor, Hans (b Neumünster, Holstein, 4 Oct 1893; d Bielefeld, 15 Jan 1976). German musicologist and critic. After studies in Geneva and Leipzig, he took the doctorate in 1919 with Riemann (whose last assistant he became) and Schering with a dissertation on the Buxheimer Orgelbuch. From 1922 to 1925 he was music critic for newspapers in Dresden and Leipzig, becoming in 1926 music editor of the Dresdner Anzeiger; he also lectured at the Dresden Conservatory. During this period began his lifelong interest in Weber. He lost his library and musicological materials in the bombing of Dresden, and after the war lived briefly in Berlin. Renewing his contacts with Weber's descendants, he resumed his Weber research, giving special attention to the diaries and letters. Schnoor moved in 1949 to Bielefeld, where he worked as a music critic and writer until his death.

Though he published many articles and books on general musical subjects, and made a special study of oratorio, it is his work on Weber that has been Schnoor's most important contribution to musicology. The first major product of these studies, Weber auf dem Welttheater (1942), concerns itself chiefly with Der Freischütz and its career in the opera house. Weber: Gestalt und Schöpfung (1953) is a more general study, though it places special emphasis on the Dresden period of Weber's life. The thoroughness of his familiarity with his subject and the painstaking nature of his scholarship give his work on Weber a unique authority and value. Many of Schnoor's papers, including material connected to his publications on Weber and the typescript of his unfinished Weber biography, are held at the Berlin Staatsbibliothek.

JOHN WARRACK

Schnorr von Carolsfeld, Ludwig (b Munich, 2 July 1836; d Dresden, 21 July 1865). German tenor. The son of the painter Julius Schnorr von Carolsfeld, he studied with Julius Otto and at the Leipzig Conservatory. While still a student he was engaged by Eduard Devrient for the Karlsruhe Hofoper in 1854, making his first solo appearances in 1855 in Norma and Der Freischütz. He had already sung smaller roles, including a soldier in Les Huguenots with his future wife, Malvina Garrigues, as Valentine in 1854. He became principal tenor of the company in 1858. He and Malvina were engaged in 1857 and married in April 1860, moving in the same year to Dresden. There he quickly made a reputation in lieder, oratorio and opera, especially as Tannhäuser and Lohengrin: his Lohengrin was praised as 'exceptional vocal material … played upon by the singer in a musical, cultivated style' (Garrigues, quoting the Dresden Signale of 7 June 1860). He began studying Tristan, but his fears and those of his wife about the demands of the role led him to abandon it. Then in 1862 at Biebrich he and Malvina sang Tristan and Isolde to Wagner, who was much moved by Schnorr's singing and praised his artistic sympathy and quickness of understanding. The couple were, with Bülow, largely responsible for the success of the first performance of Tristan und Isolde on 10 June 1865 (see illustration), after it had been delayed by Malvina's hoarseness. Schnorr in turn acknowledged that 'I know full well how much is due to me, how small was my part in the success, what driving force Wagner exercised on me. … From that day I consider myself dedicated as an artist' (letter to Cosima Wagner, 12 June 1865). It was largely the strain of the experience that caused him to develop a feverish chill. His last public appearance was in Munich as Erik in Der fliegende Holländer (9 July 1865), though he sang some excerpts from the Ring and Die Meistersinger before Ludwig II on 12 July. Returning to Dresden, he rehearsed Don Giovanni on the 15th, but on the 16th developed what he termed a 'springende Gicht' (rampant gout) that began in his knee and led to delirium. He burst into song on his deathbed, calling repeatedly on Wagner's name.

A corpulent, powerfully built man, with baritone colour in his tenor voice, Schnorr was praised for his smoothness of line, his portamento, and his 'elegiac, somewhat veiled' tone (Prölss). Wagner described his voice as 'full, soft and gleaming', but regarded him as inferior vocally to Tichatschek though greatly superior in dramatic power and intelligence. Schnorr's death affected Wagner profoundly, on both personal and artistic grounds: 'In him I lost … the great granite block needed to raise my building, and found myself directed to seek his replacement in a pile of bricks'. Schnorr also composed some music and wrote poetry.

His wife Malvina, née Garrigues (b Copenhagen, 7 Dec 1825; d Karlsruhe, 8 Feb 1904), was the daughter of the

Ludwig Schnorr von Carolsfeld as Tristan in the first performance of Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde', Munich, 1865

Brazilian consul in Copenhagen. She studied in Paris with Manuel Garcia and sang in Breslau (1841–9), making her début in Robert le diable, then in Coburg, Gotha, Hamburg and (from 1854) in Karlsruhe. She was praised for her powerful, ringing soprano and her fluent technique. After her husband's death she was unable to continue her career and sank into depression: she took up spiritualism, and in a largely unbalanced state brought various pressures to bear upon Wagner and Cosima at Triebschen. Towards the end of her life she taught in Frankfurt, where her pupils included Gudehus. She also wrote songs and published a volume of poems by her husband and herself.

Schnyder von Wartensee, (Franz) Xaver (b Lucerne, 15 April 1786; d Frankfurt, 27 Aug 1868). Swiss composer. He studied the violin as a youth, and at 16 he began to study the piano. His father, a politician, wanted to train him for a political career, but Schnyder soon broke off his career as a civil servant and, having taught himself the double bass, cello, clarinet, viola and timpani, went to Zürich in 1810. The following year he went to Vienna and planned to study composition with Beethoven, who did not take him as a pupil but consented to examine and criticize some of Schnyder's compositions; Schnyder studied with J.C. Kienlen instead. He took a lively part in Vienna's musical life and settled in Baden; but a fire in his home destroyed all his possessions, and in 1812 he returned to Switzerland. For two years he lived in Lucerne, devoting himself to music, poetry, physics and literature. In 1814 he moved into the Schloss Wartensee, which he had inherited.

In 1816 Schnyder moved to Yverdon to teach singing at Pestalozzi's institute. The next year he went to Frankfurt, where he composed and gave lessons, and where his works were performed. He studied the glass harmonica and gave recitals on this instrument, as well as on the piano. In 1828 he founded the Frankfurt Liederkranz; his oratorio Zeit und Ewigkeit was written for the 1838 Frankfurt choral festival. He lived in Lucerne for a while before returning to Frankfurt to spend the last years of his life.

One of Switzerland's most important and versatile musicians of the late Classical and early Romantic periods, Schnyder composed with imagination, wit and feeling, and his works are melodically charming and rich in unusually delicate contrapuntal writing. Beside composing music, he took pleasure in writing essays on musicians and musical events, compiling memoirs and writing his autobiography, Lebenserinnerungen (Zürich, 1887). In 1847 he founded the Schnyder von Wartensee Foundation in Zürich, which still sets subjects for competitions in various branches of science and supports the publication of scientific and artistic work.

Schoberlechner, Franz (b Vienna, 21 July 1797; d Berlin, 7 Jan 1843). Austrian pianist and composer. He studied with Hummel and, at his successful début in 1809, played the C major Piano Concerto which his teacher had composed specially for him. He then studied further with E.A. Förster, and in 1814 made a concert tour to Italy. While in Florence he wrote a requiem and I virtuosi teatrali (1817), an opera buffa. After visits to Rome and Naples he was engaged as Kapellmeister by the Duchess Marie Louise of Lucca, for whom he composed the opera Gli arabi nelle gallie (1819). He returned soon afterwards to Vienna, where his operetta Der junge Onkel was performed in 1823. Arming himself with letters of introduction (having been refused one by Beethoven), he then set off for Russia. In St Petersburg in 1824 he married the singer Sophie Dall'Occa (b St Petersburg, 1807; d 1864), a pupil of her father Filippo. After travelling in Russia, Germany and Italy, they returned to St Petersburg, where Sophie sang with great success at the Italian Opera for three years (1827–30), including appearances with Malibran. Her husband wrote his opera Il barone di Dolzheim for her (performed 1827). In 1831 they bought an estate near Florence, but continued to make further concert tours. Schoberlechner's last opera, Rossane, was performed in Milan in 1839. He died while on tour in Berlin, and Sophie, having retired when her voice began to fail in 1840, was obliged to return to Russia and teach singing. Schoberlechner's operas had some success in their day. His concert works, mostly in virtuoso vein, reflect his own skill as a pianist and his ability to satisfy contemporary taste; they include two piano concertos, three sets of variations for piano and orchestra which show the influence of Hummel, and numerous variations and rondos for piano solo.

JOHN WARRACK

Schobert, Johann [Jean] (b ?Silesia, *c*1735; d Paris, 28 Aug 1767). Silesian harpsichordist and composer. Grimm's testimony that he was Silesian has been generally accepted. Gerber's Historisch-biographisches Lexicon der Tonkünstler, however, gives Strasbourg as his place of birth (though the name occurs in no contemporary Alsatian records), and Schubart in his autobiography claimed Schobert as a kinsman, supposedly from Nuremberg. Finally Riemann associated Schobert with the Mannheim school because of stylistic similarities and the dedication of op.3 to 'M. Saum, conseiller du commerce et agent de S.A.S. Mgr le Prince Palatin'. It is possible, however, that Saum exercised his authority from Paris and that Schobert made his acquaintance there; this conjecture is supported by the fact that the records at Mannheim fail to reveal Schobert's name.

Nothing definite is known of his life until his appearance in Paris in 1760 or 1761 and his employment in the service of the Prince of Conti. For several years thereafter he published instrumental music which was engraved at his own expense (and probably in his own home) and distributed to the various Parisian dealers – an arrangement no doubt made possible by his position with the Prince de Conti, which shielded him from the exploitation of publishers. Soon after his arrival in Paris Schobert married a Frenchwoman by whom he had at least two children. In 1765 he made a single, and thoroughly unsuccessful, venture into opéra comique, with La garde-chasse et le braconnier (he had earlier contributed to a pasticcio). The only remaining information concerning his life is Baron Grimm's account of his gruesome death, along with his wife and one child, as a result of eating poisonous mushrooms.

Grimm's eulogy gives some impression of Schobert's abilities as a performer and composer, and of his personal character:

> This musician had a great talent, a brilliant and bewitching technique. He was unequalled in the ease and pure delight in his performance. He did not have as much talent as Eckard, who will always remain the first maestro in Paris, but Schobert had more admirers than Eckard, because he was always agreeable ... Schobert's compositions were charming. He had no valuable ideas to be emulated, but he knew perfectly the effects and magic of harmony and he wrote with great ease.

La Borde, who must have known Schobert personally, described him similarly as having 'manners as gentle and as simple as his talent was extraordinary'. Opposed to these statements is Leopold Mozart's letter of 1 February 1764, which accuses Schobert of 'envy' and 'jealousy', and concludes that 'Schobert is not at all the man he is said to be – he flatters to one's face and is utterly false'. In view of Schobert's influence on the young Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and the adaptations of his works which must have been carried out under Leopold's guidance, these remarks seem incongruous; Leopold was probably identifying Schobert with what he regarded as the degenerate Parisian society of the time.

Schobert greatly influenced Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, who admired his music warmly. The work which most impressed the seven-year-old composer seems to have been the D major Sonata of op.3; imitation of this sonata and others can be traced in Mozart's subsequent Parisian and English sonatas. Movements from Schobert's sonatas also appear recast in Mozart's earliest piano concertos. His fascination for Schobert's music was not merely fleeting: when Mozart was in Paris in 1778 he taught his pupils Schobert's sonatas, and the A minor Sonata K310, composed in Paris, contains in its Andante an almost literal quotation from a movement of Schobert's op.17 no.1 that Mozart had already arranged years before in a concerto.

Schobert's compositions reveal a skilled and imaginative artist. Several works in their entirety, and several individual movements, possess a spontaneity and freshness of expression that still make an impact. However, many of his works reveal an inability to develop a theme or motif fully: he often resorted to over-extended sequences and occasionally to the empty display of technical virtuosity. This bears out Grimm's remarks that Schobert 'did everything with ease' and that he was content with a less than finished work.

Schobert's significance rests not in the quality of his music but rather in his development of formal and stylistic features which found their complete expression in the closing years of the 18th century and in the opening decade of the 19th. He was one of the few composers who were capable of producing an individual idiom that went beyond the accepted style of the day. In Schobert's particular area, that of keyboard music with accompanying instruments (often ad libitum), he discovered new forms and means of expression as important as the innovations produced in other European centres between 1750 and 1775.

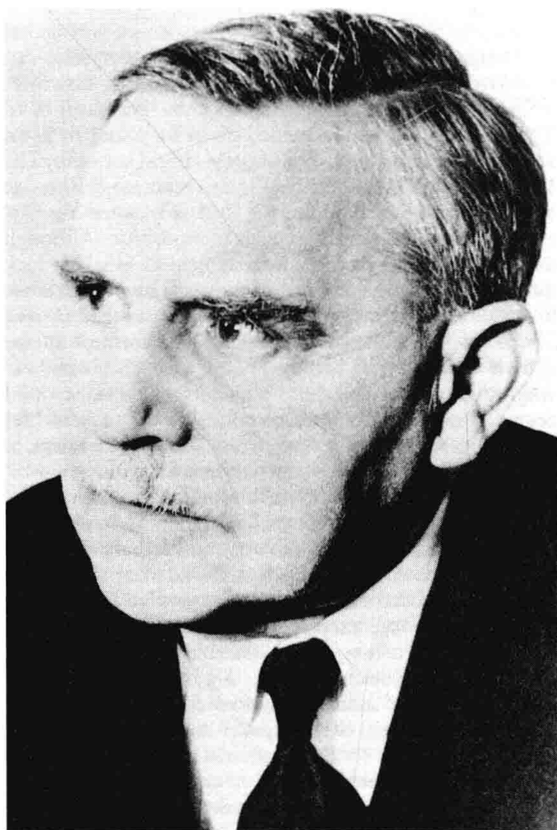
HERBERT C. TURRENTINE

Schock, Rudolf (Johann) (b Duisburg, 4 Sept 1915; d Gürzenich, 13 Nov 1986). German tenor. He studied in Cologne and with Laurenz Hofer in Hanover, and joined the Duisburg opera chorus at the age of 18, later studying with Robert von der Linde in Berlin. He began singing major roles at Brunswick in 1937; after wartime service he resumed his career, singing in Hanover, Berlin and as a member of the Hamburg Staatsoper (1947–56). His Covent Garden début was in 1949 as Rodolfo (with Schwarzkopf as Mimì), followed by Alfredo, Pinkerton and Tamino in the same season. During the 1950s he was admired at the Vienna Staatsoper and at the Salzburg Festival, where he played Idomeneus and sang in the 1954 première of Liebermann's Penelope, and in 1959 appeared as Walther at Bayreuth. He recorded this role under Kempe, as he did Lohengrin with Schüchter, Bacchus with Karajan and Max under Keilberth. Later he became popular in operetta, musical films and television, and was acclaimed as a successor to Tauber. Schock was a lyric tenor with a strong top register, which allowed him to play such heroic roles as Florestan and Lohengrin; his voice was warmer and more flexible than his acting, which benefited from strong direction.

NOËL GOODWIN

Schoeck, Othmar (b Brunnen, 1 Sept 1886; d Zürich, 8 March 1957). Swiss composer, conductor and pianist. The son of landscape painter Alfred Schoeck, he grew up in the idyllic surroundings of Brunnen, a village by Lake Lucerne. He enrolled at a Zürich art school in early 1904, but left the following autumn to study music at the Zürich Conservatory, where his teachers included Friedrich Hegar, Lothar Kempter and Robert Freund among others. Schoeck's songs from this period, while surprisingly mature, bear the clear influence of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Wolf. In particular, they reflect Wolf's practice of basing a whole song on a brief accompanimental ostinato.



At the express invitation of Reger, Schoeck enrolled at the Leipzig Conservatory (1907–8). Apart from an increased interest in contrapuntal techniques, however, he appropriated little from Reger's style. He returned to Zürich in 1908 where he earned his living primarily as an accompanist and conductor of male choral societies. The Violin Sonata (1908–9), the Violin Concerto (1911–12) and the First String Quartet (1911–13) were his first major forays into absolute music composition. Although these works display a considerable melodic gift, they lack the mastery of large-scale form that was to emerge later. In 1916 his first stage work, the singspiel Erwin und Elmire (1911–16), was successfully performed at the Zürich Stadttheater. The following year, Schoeck was appointed conductor of the orchestra of St Gallen and began to receive payments of what proved to be a lifelong supplementary income from Werner Reinhart, a benefactor known for his patronage to Stravinsky.

During World War I Schoeck mixed with many of the artists who flocked to neutral Zürich; it was Busoni who suggested the topic of his next opera: Holberg's comedy Don Ranudo. Armin Rüeger, a friend from Schoeck's youth and a gifted amateur writer, provided the libretto. The opera, although rarely performed outside Switzerland after that time, met with considerable acclaim at its first performance (Zürich, 1919). Significant growth in Schoeck's musical maturity coincided with the beginning of an affair between the composer and Genevan pianist, Mary de Senger, in 1918. The second act of Venus (1919–21), his next opera, boasts fascinating bitonal and polyrhythmic effects. For unknown reasons, however, Schoeck declined an offer from Breitkopf for a double première of the opera in Germany, instead conducting the first performance himself in Zürich in 1922. In mid-1923 Schoeck visited Arthur Honegger in Paris and later took part in the Salzburg ISCM festival. Shortly thereafter, his relationship with de Senger ended.

Schoeck's trauma upon losing de Senger was compounded by the artistic shock he experienced in Paris and Salzburg. Newly acquainted with the music of Les Six, Stravinsky, Krenek, Berg and others, he now felt isolated by his stylistic conservatism. The song Die Entschwundene (1923), composed two weeks after the end of his relationship, is as much a farewell to the tonal world of his previous music as to his departed lover. Within a few weeks he wrote the brief song cycle Gaselen (1923) and began work on the opera Penthesilea (1923–5), compositions that not only abandon traditional tonality for lengthy stretches, but also display tendencies towards constructivism and serial organization. Penthesilea features scenes built upon ostinato patterns and repeated rhythms reminiscent of Berg's Wozzeck, a work with which Schoeck was familiar after attending the first performance of 'Three Pieces' from Wozzeck in Frankfurt (1924). To his distress, Penthesilea received no more than a polite reception at its première (Dresden State Opera, 1927).

In December 1925 Schoeck married Hilde Bartscher, a German soprano over ten years his junior. While Bartscher seems to have expected their marriage to become an artistic partnership, they did not perform in public together until the 1940s. Conflicting marital expectations resulted in years of strife only partly alleviated by the birth of a daughter, Gisela.

Othmar Schoeck

Schoeck's next work, Lebendig begraben (1926), a song cycle for bass and orchestra, develops the musical language of Penthesilea further. The Sonata for Bass Clarinet and Piano (1927–8), however, is perhaps his most 'modern' work. Its last movement features a wrong-note experiment in ragtime reminiscent of Stravinsky. After the work was rejected from the ISCM festival in Siena, Schoeck's hitherto occasionally derogatory remarks about contemporary music became frequent and virulent. He turned his back on Modernism almost as rapidly as he had embraced it four years earlier. His next two works, the song cycle Wandersprüche (1928) and the dramatic cantata Vom Fischer un syner Fru (1928–30), continue to exhibit an interest in constructivism and the merging of vocal and instrumental forms (Vom Fischer was conceived as a set of orchestral variations with fugue à la Reger), but also make evident a return to tonality.

Schoeck's works of the 1930s show further consolidation of his newly regained harmonic conservatism without abandoning the technical advances made in his works of the 1920s. This idiosyncratic combination of old and new accounts for much of the fascination of Schoeck's later music. The Notturno (1931–3) for baritone and string quartet, written during a period of intense marital strife, betrays the influence of the Second Viennese School. One of his finest works, it gained the admiration of Alban Berg.

Although a firm believer in Swiss democracy, Schoeck's increasingly conservative aesthetic endeared him to the cultural administrators of the Third Reich. From 1933 onwards, there was a surge of German interest in his music. Flattered by his success and mindful of the consequences of distancing himself openly from the Nazis, Schoeck accepted the politically-tainted Erwin von Steinbach Prize of Freiburg University in 1937 and allowed the première of his last opera, Das Schloss Dürande (1937–41), to be performed at the Berlin Staatsoper (1943). The librettist, Hermann Burte, although a gifted poet, was a novice librettist and a known Nazi sympathizer. Although the quality of the first performance was high (as the recorded excerpts make clear) and the audience enthusiastic, Hermann Goering denounced the libretto as 'manure' shortly thereafter. The run was stopped prematurely based on an explanation that the cast suddenly had 'other engagements'. The Zürich première that followed two months later failed miserably. Having allowed the first performance to take place in the capital city of a potential enemy power, Schoeck was regarded as a traitor by many of his fellow Swiss. He fell into a deep depression and was unable to compose for months. On 9 March 1944 he suffered a heart attack from which he never fully recovered.

During his convalescence, Schoeck's friend Hermann Hesse sent him several poems by the Zürich poet Heinrich Leuthold. Schoeck was captivated and set them to music as Spielmannsweisen (1944), a cycle for voice and harp. A further Leuthold cycle followed some months later and in 1946 Schoeck composed Das stille Leuchten to poems by Conrad Ferdinand Meyer. His sudden devotion to Swiss poets was most likely a reaction to the earlier suggestion that he had betrayed his homeland; indeed some of the songs in Das stille Leuchten are unashamedly patriotic. While a number of impressive works exist from Schoeck's later years, there is an undeniable decline in his compositional inspiration, concurrent with, from the 1940s onwards, a simplification in his musical language. At the same time, his criticism of other composers became heated and irrational. Concerts celebrating his 70th birthday (1956) were not well attended; he died of heart failure six months later.

A picture of Schoeck as a fierce anti-modernist, the 'last Romantic' – though inaccurate – was one that his friend and first biographer, Hans Corrodi, perpetuated. His compositions fell into neglect in the 1960s and interest in his music was not revived until the late 70s. Since that time, his operas have enjoyed several successful productions and his *c*300 songs have been recorded. Recordings featuring Schoeck performing as an accompanist have also been released.

CHRIS WALTON

Schoeffer [Schöffer], Peter, jr (b Mainz, *c*1475–80; d Basle, 1547). German printer. He learnt the printing trade from his father, Peter Schoeffer, associate of Gutenberg and co-publisher (with Johannes Fust) of the famous Mainz Psalterium (1457). After the elder Schoeffer's death in 1502 or 1503 his son established his own printing business, which, as a Protestant sympathizer, he was forced to sell in the summer of 1512. For the rest of his life he moved from one city to another. As early as 1518 he began printing in Worms, although he did not move his business there until 1520. Once again he was expelled from the city, this time because of his involvement with the Anabaptist movement. In 1529 he became a citizen of Strasbourg through his marriage to Anna Pfintzer and set up his business there, associating himself first with his former typesetter in Worms, Johann Schwintzer, then in 1534 with MATHIAS APIARIUS, with whom he published collections of sacred music between 1534 and 1537. In 1539 he can be traced in Basle and in 1541–2 in Venice, where he published at least seven works before his final return to Basle. His last years appear to have been spent working as a type founder for other printers and it has recently been suggested (Bain) that Schoeffer's music type was used for the Kemperliedboek.

Although the number of his music publications was relatively small (14 out of about 100 works), he is perhaps best known for his superb craftsmanship in this field, producing unusually elegant notation by means of multiple impression. His early collections of German songs (RISM 1513[2] and *c*1515[3]), including works by such composers as Hofhaimer, Schönfelder, Siess and Virdung, represent the repertory of the Stuttgart court chapel under Ulrich of Württemberg. He also published Arnolt Schlick's famous organ and lute tablature (1512[2], ed. G. Harms (Hamburg, 1924); selections ed. in Eitner).

MARIE LOUISE GÖLLNER

Schoelcher, Victor (b Paris, 21 July 1804; d Houilles, nr Paris, 25 Dec 1893). French writer and politician. The son of a porcelain manufacturer, Schoelcher first made his mark as an art critic, but it was during a voyage to the Caribbean and the southern USA in 1829–30 that he found his true calling, when he encountered slavery for the first time. From then on, Schoelcher was a tireless champion for the slaves of the French territories, and he published numerous pamphlets and books arguing for the abolition of involuntary servitude. Appointed Under-Secretary of State in 1848, he wrote, and succeeded in passing, the law abolishing slavery in the French colonies. Schoelcher opposed the coup d'état of December 1851 and was exiled. He spent the next 18 years in England, where his fascination with Handel was born. In August 1870 he returned to France; in 1871 he was elected to the National Assembly, where he served until being voted a senator for life in December 1875.

Schoelcher was a distinguished collector and a prolific author. He amassed a remarkable collection of books, scores, musical instruments and objets d'art that was mostly given before his death to a variety of libraries and museums. He published numerous books and pamphlets, primarily on slavery, but also on such subjects as prison reform, revocation of the death penalty, women's rights and contemporary history, as well as essays and two books on music, La modernité de la musique (Paris, 1881) and The Life of Handel (London, 1857). He also left important catalogues of Handel's music and revisions of his Handel biography (MS in F-Pc).

The Life of Handel (written in French and translated by James Lowe) is a significant landmark in the history of Handel studies. This was the first biography of the composer to be based upon solid documentary research, and to Schoelcher must go the credit for uncovering many significant sources concerning Handel's life and works. Using newspapers, earlier biographies, a wide range of contemporary sources and the full spectrum of manuscript and printed sources for Handel's music, Schoelcher provided a rounded portrait of the composer and of the social and musical world in which he moved. To support his research, Schoelcher brought together a vast collection of Handelian literature, music and portraits. This collection, known as the Fonds Schoelcher, was donated to the Paris Conservatoire in at least three stages from 1872, and is now at the Bibliothèque Nationale. The collection numbers over 3000 items and includes important manuscripts, printed editions, librettos and ephemera.

Perhaps as a result of Sir George Grove's opinion (Grove1), and also because it is difficult to know how much of his research was done by Michael Rophino Lacy, Schoelcher's musical scholarship has not been adequately appreciated. However, his catalogues are remarkable achievements that have served as a basis for subsequent efforts. Moreover, his research on such issues as borrowings, compositional process and performance practices, and his sophisticated dating of the printed editions of Handel's music were far in advance of his time.

Schoemaker, Maurice (b Anderlecht, Brussels, 27 Dec 1890; d Brussels, 24 Aug 1964). Belgian composer. He studied harmony with Ysaÿe, counterpoint with Brusselmans, fugue with Lunssens and composition as well as orchestration with Gilson. On the occasion of Gilson's 60th birthday (1925) he founded a group of leading progressive composers, the 'Synthétistes', consisting of former pupils of Gilson. His Vuurwerk was very successful, thanks to outstanding performances by the Belgian Military Guides' Band under Arthur Prévost. The rich orchestration and evocative nature of his orchestral music seek to express something of the Flemish character; the same brilliance of colour is found in his opera Swane, a work which embraces the jocular and the tragic. CORNEEL MERTENS/DIANA VON VOLBORTH-DANYS

Schoenberg [Schönberg], Arnold (Franz Walter) (b Vienna, 13 Sept 1874; d Los Angeles, 13 July 1951). Austro-Hungarian composer.

1. LIFE UP TO WORLD WAR I. His father Samuel (1838–89) was born in Szécsény, his mother (née Nachod, 1848–1921) in Prague. They came to Vienna from Pressburg (Bratislava). Schoenberg accordingly inherited Hungarian nationality, which was converted to Czech on the formation of the state of Czechoslovakia in 1918. He became an American citizen in 1941. The family was Jewish, and the three children, Arnold, Ottilie and Heinrich, were brought up in the orthodox faith. Neither parent was particularly musical; Schoenberg remembered his uncle Fritz Nachod, who wrote poetry and taught him French, as the main cultural influence of his childhood. But his sister and brother showed musical talent, and the latter, like their cousin Hans Nachod, became a professional singer. Schoenberg's musical education began when he was eight with violin lessons, and he very soon began composing by the light of nature, imitating the violin duets by such composers as Pleyel and Viotti that he was given to learn, and arranging anything that came his way – operatic melodies or military band music – for the same combination. Somewhat later, having met a schoolfellow who played the viola, he was able to spread his wings to the point of writing trios for two violins and viola.

The family was not well off. In the year after the death of his father, who had kept a shoe shop, Schoenberg was obliged to leave school and take employment as a clerk in a small private bank, where he remained for about five years. Meanwhile he pursued music, literature and philosophy in the evenings, his interest fired by two friends of his own age, David Josef Bach and Oskar Adler. According to his own account Bach taught him the courage to keep his artistic ideals high. Adler was in effect his first music teacher. He was a good violinist, and Schoenberg taught himself the cello, at first using a large viola adapted with zither strings, and then a proper cello which he began by playing with violin fingering. Together they formed an amateur ensemble which permitted Schoenberg to explore the Classical chamber music repertory from the inside and to compose quartets. Adler helped him to educate his ear through playing, and taught him some elementary harmony. For the musical forms he turned to articles in a popular encyclopedia.

Schoenberg and his friends heard very little music except what they could play themselves. Concerts were beyond their means, though they would sometimes stand outside café enclosures to eavesdrop on the band. While he was still working in the bank Schoenberg joined an amateur orchestra, really no more than a handful of string players, conducted by Alexander von Zemlinsky, and the two soon became firm friends. Zemlinsky, the elder by three years, had attended the Vienna Conservatory, where he had distinguished himself. His compositions had attracted Brahms's notice. He was therefore in a position to help Schoenberg with the formal instruction that he had so far missed. Although Schoenberg received encouragement from Josef Labor, to whom he submitted a movement from a string quartet in C in about 1894, and from Richard Heuberger, Zemlinsky was the only regular teacher he ever had. The importance of Zemlinsky's influence is hard to assess. In later life Schoenberg ascribed to him most of his knowledge of the problems and techniques of composing, whereas Zemlinsky merely said that they had shown each other their works. It is difficult to believe that Schoenberg ever needed to be prompted twice about a general principle of composition, but he certainly respected Zemlinsky's advice, and the pattern of their early relationship persisted. At a time when misunderstanding had taught Schoenberg to hold himself aloof, he continued to treat Zemlinsky as an equal both as man and musician.

In the autumn of 1897 Schoenberg wrote a string quartet in D major, making various changes in the course of composition in response to Zemlinsky's criticisms. When it was done both felt that it marked a new stage in his work, and Zemlinsky, who was on the committee of the Wiener Tonkünstlerverein, proposed it for performance. It was accepted, played at a concert for members only the following March, and well enough received to be repeated in the next season. It was many years before a new work of Schoenberg's was to meet with comparable success. The Verein turned down his string sextet Verklärte Nacht in 1899, and there were protests when songs from opp.1–3 were sung in public in December 1900. From that time on, in his own words, the scandal never stopped. In these early works he had already taken the first steps in the development of chromaticism that was to lead him to abandon triadic harmony and tonality itself by 1908, and each stage in his progress aroused fresh hostility. For the moment, however, little was heard of him. He kept the wolf from the door by conducting workers' choral societies associated with the Social Democratic Party and orchestrating operettas, and managed between March 1900 and April 1901 to compose the vast Gurre-Lieder.

In October 1901 Schoenberg married Zemlinsky's sister Mathilde (1877–1923). There were two children of the marriage: Gertrud (1902–47), who married Schoenberg's pupil Felix Greissle in 1921 and emigrated to the USA in 1938, and Georg (1906–74). In December the young couple moved to Berlin, where Schoenberg had got a job on the musical side of Überbrettl, a kind of cabaret that formed part of Ernst von Wolzogen's Buntes Theater. The idea behind Überbrettl was to use the popular mode to serious ends. Various well-known men of letters, such as Wedekind, Morgenstern and Dehmel, were interested in it. In the summer Schoenberg had tried his hand at setting verses of the Überbrettl type, and at least one song, Nachtwandler, was subsequently performed in Berlin, though only once. Schoenberg's employment there lasted only until the following summer, after which he was obliged to interrupt the orchestration of the Gurre-Lieder in order to score operettas. He was saved from further drudgery of this kind by Richard Strauss, to whom he had shown parts of the Gurre-Lieder and his new symphonic poem Pelleas und Melisande. Strauss was impressed, and used his influence to obtain for him the Liszt Stipendium and a post as composition teacher at the Stern Conservatory. So he stayed on in Berlin for another year and returned to Vienna in July 1903 with the completed score of Pelleas.

That autumn various musical classes were organized in rooms made available at a girls' school founded by Dr Eugenie Schwarzwald. Schoenberg taught harmony and counterpoint there for a single season, and Zemlinsky, in whose house he was living at the time, taught form and orchestration. When Schoenberg gave up his class some of its members continued to study composition and theory with him privately, among them a number of students of music history under Mahler's friend Guido Adler at the University of Vienna. In the autumn of 1904 this nucleus was joined by two new recruits, Webern (an Adler pupil) and Berg, who were to fulfil their promise as composers through acceptance and individual reinterpretation of the successive steps in their master's development, and bring him the support of their lifelong personal and artistic loyalty.

If private teaching was scarcely lucrative for Schoenberg – he taught Berg free for the first year because his family was not in a position to pay fees – composition was still less so. The Viennese public was conservative in its tastes and reluctant to support new work in any of the arts. Special societies attempted to remedy this situation. To one of them, the Ansorge Verein, Schoenberg owed various early performances, starting with some of his songs early in 1904. At this time he and Zemlinsky were already planning a society of their own, which they launched successfully under the title Vereinigung Schaffender Tonkünstler. For their honorary president they managed to secure Mahler, whose brother-in-law Arnold Rosé had invited him to rehearsals of Verklärte Nacht the previous year when Rosé was preparing the quartet that he led for a performance of it. Mahler was deeply impressed and became a staunch supporter of Schoenberg, even though he did not always see eye to eye with him over artistic matters. The new society survived only for the season 1904–5 but succeeded in putting on sizable works by Mahler, Strauss, Zemlinsky and others, and in January the first performance of Pelleas und Melisande, conducted by the composer. The orchestra was ill at ease and the reception cool.

The pattern of Schoenberg's life for the next few years was now set. A heavy teaching programme did not save him and his family from material hardship; as late as 1910 he was obliged to borrow from Mahler to pay the rent, and the following year Berg launched an appeal on his behalf, though without his knowledge. The style of his music, which he composed largely in the slacker summer months, became increasingly dissonant; each new work raised a storm. The Rosé quartet gave the first performances of the first quartet and Kammersymphonie early in 1907. Mahler stood up for both works in public, and although he privately confessed that he could not fully understand Schoenberg's development he never lost faith in him. His removal from Vienna that spring deprived Schoenberg of a valuable ally, though in the four years that remained to him his concern for Schoenberg's well-being and interest in his work never faltered. Uproar predictably greeted Rosé's first performance of the Second Quartet in December 1908, and when the first freely dissonant works, Das Buch der hängenden Gärten and the op.11 piano pieces, were presented in January 1910 they met with almost universal incomprehension.

These were years of crisis not only for Schoenberg's musical style but in his domestic life. He had made the acquaintance of the Viennese painters Oskar Kokoschka and Richard Gerstl, and in 1908 took up painting seriously. Gerstl, who had become a family friend, gave lessons to both him and his wife. During that summer he discovered that she was having an affair with Gerstl, with whom she then went to live. Later she was persuaded to return for the sake of the children; in November Gerstl committed suicide.

In October 1910 Schoenberg mounted a one-man exhibition. The following January he received a letter from the expressionist painter Kandinsky, whose sympathy for his work extended beyond his painting to his music and ideas. This initiated a lasting friendship. Schoenberg exhibited with the group Der Blaue Reiter founded by Kandinsky, and contributed an essay and a facsimile of Herzgewächse to the first and only number of the periodical that bore its name. He showed pictures elsewhere, but, although he continued to paint and draw occasionally in later years, visual means of expression quickly lost the importance that they had briefly held for him.

For some years Schoenberg had kept up a fairly steady output of music, culminating in the extraordinary works of 1909: the op.11 piano pieces, the Fünf Orchesterstücke op.16 and Erwartung. But now the pace slackened. His spare time in the years 1910–11 was largely devoted to writing the Harmonielehre and completing the long-delayed orchestration of the Gurre-Lieder. In 1910 he offered his services to the Kaiserliche-Königliche Akademie für Musik und Darstellende Kunst as an external lecturer in theory and composition. His application was successful, but his hopes that this might lead to a professorship were thwarted. A question was asked in parliament, and he was subjected to virulent attacks on racial grounds. By the end of the academic year his circumstances had so far deteriorated that he decided to try his luck once again in Berlin, and moved there with his family in the autumn of 1911.

His arrival was greeted with some extremely unpleasant comment in the press, and his winter lectures at the Stern Conservatory were poorly attended. Nevertheless his fortunes at last began to improve a little. His name at least was now internationally familiar, audiences were beginning to find his earlier music more accessible, and his later work was arousing curiosity. Pierrot lunaire, composed in the summer of 1912, was given with considerable success under the composer's direction in October, and then went on tour to 11 German and Austrian cities. Sir Henry Wood had given the first performance of the op.16 orchestral pieces in London the previous month, and that of the Gurre-Lieder took place in Vienna the following February under Schreker. This was an overwhelming success, but the composer, smarting under years of very different treatment from the Viennese public, refused to acknowledge its applause. Five weeks later it took its revenge by bringing a concert of music by Schoenberg and his associates to a halt. Meanwhile Schoenberg, relieved of immediate financial worries by the generosity of a rich patron, determined to make a secondary career as a conductor. He lacked experience, but Zemlinsky arranged for him to conduct, early in 1912, a concert including Pelleas und Melisande. This set him on the road. By the outbreak of war he had conducted Pelleas, the Gurre-Lieder and the Fünf Orchesterstücke in a number of European cities.

2. WORLD WAR I AND AFTER. The war put an end to these developments. Concerts, especially of new music, were less in demand. Many of Schoenberg's pupils were called up, and his teaching ceased entirely. In May 1915 he was himself medically examined in Vienna for the reserve, but to his surprise he was rejected on account of goitre. In September he moved his family back to Vienna, having accepted after some hesitation the offer of a rent-free house from his patron Frau Lieser. Then, after a second medical examination had reversed the decision of the earlier one, he finally joined up in December as a one-year volunteer. Schoenberg's health had, however, never been strong; under the strain of a course of training at Bruck an der Leitha he began to suffer from asthma, to which he was subject all his life, and other ailments. Friends tried to secure his release, which came through quite unexpectedly in October 1916. In the last four years he had written very little music, apart from finishing Die glückliche Hand in 1913 and composing the op.22 orchestral songs at intervals between that year and 1916. But he had been constantly preoccupied with plans for a large-scale religious work. After his return to civilian life he finally decided to embody his ideas in an oratorio. By May 1917 the text of Die Jakobsleiter was ready.

2. Arnold Schoenberg

In June he began to compose the music. The time could scarcely have been less favourable. Food and the coal necessary to cook it were becoming desperately short in Vienna; money, at least in the Schoenberg household, was shorter still. Yet in the space of three months Schoenberg set the whole of the first part of the oratorio, though without fully working out the orchestration. During the same period he made known plans for a seminar in composition which would avoid any set course of instruction unrelated to the individual needs of the pupil, and for which each pupil would pay only what he could afford. September brought further difficulties. Schoenberg found himself obliged to leave his house. Potential landlords showed themselves suspicious of his prospects, and for many weeks the family endured the acute discomfort of cheap boarding-houses. On 17 September he was called up again. This time he was given C grading, and, although a transfer away from Vienna remained a possibility until his final discharge in December, his duties were much lighter than before and he was often at home. Consequently he was able to go forward with his seminar at the Schwarzwald school. It prospered, and after his move to Mödling the following April he continued to hold classes there until 1920. But to the oratorio the short spell of military service proved fatal. Despite constant efforts to pick up the thread, he had managed by 1922 to compose only about half of the interlude intended to link the two halves of the work, after which he added nothing more.

A direct outcome of the seminar was the foundation of the Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen, the object of which was to give properly rehearsed performances of modern works to a genuinely interested membership. For one class of seat members paid only according to their means. The press was excluded. Details of programmes were not available in advance, and many works were repeated as a point of policy. Orchestral works were given in arrangements for piano or chamber ensemble. In the three years between February 1919 and the end of 1921, when inflation put an end to the society's activities, 353 performances of 154 works were given in 117 concerts. A number of Schoenberg's pupils and ex-pupils helped with the organization of this vast enterprise, but he rehearsed and directed a considerable proportion of the performances himself. Meanwhile peace brought a renewal of international interest in his music. Conducting engagements took him abroad. In Amsterdam he was made president of the International Mahler League, and he returned there for the winter of 1920–21 to take part in a festival of his own works and give a series of lectures on music theory. This was the time of the formulation of serialism. The first three serial works, the op.23 piano pieces, the Serenade and the Suite for piano op.25, were written between 1920 and 1923. The Wind Quintet was completed the next year, which saw the first performances not only of the Serenade and Quintet, but of Erwartung (in Prague) and Die glückliche Hand (in Vienna).

In October 1923 Mathilde Schoenberg died. Despite the unhappy events of 1908, from which the marriage had never fully recovered, Schoenberg's letters written at the time of her death leave no doubt of the depth of his attachment to her. A month later he completed his text entitled Requiem, a meditation on death the first section of which had been drafted somewhat earlier; he never set it to music. His widowerhood did not, however, last long: at the end of the following August, about a fortnight before his 50th birthday, he married Gertrud Kolisch (1898–1967), the sister of his pupil Rudolf Kolisch. (Kolisch was a violinist and the leader of a string quartet which became the leading exponent of Schoenberg's chamber music in the 1920s and 1930s.) There were three children of this marriage: Dorothea Nuria (b Barcelona, 1932), who married the Italian composer Luigi Nono, Rudolf Ronald (b 1937) and Lawrence Adam (b 1941).

In 1925 Schoenberg was invited to take charge of the masterclass in composition at the Akademie der Künste in Berlin, in succession to Busoni, who had died the year before. He accepted, signed the contract in September, and after some delay because of an appendix operation moved in January 1926 from Vienna to Berlin for the third and last time. Some of his pupils, notably Gerhard and Zillig, moved with him, and Eisler, though no longer his pupil, did so independently at about the same time; Skalkottas was to join the class a little later. For the next seven years Schoenberg enjoyed better conditions of work than at any time in his life. He had a say in general questions of policy and administration in the academy, and absolute responsibility for his own courses. Moreover he was required to teach for an average of only six months in the year, and could choose his own times. His creative output increased correspondingly. The Suite op.29, largely written in Vienna, was followed by the Variationen für Orchester, the play Der biblische Weg, the Third Quartet, Von heute auf morgen, the Begleitungsmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene, Moses und Aron, the Cello Concerto after Monn, and various smaller pieces. His earlier works continued to gain ground with audiences, and his more recent ones were at least assured of a hearing, if not of approval: the orchestral variations, for instance, had a very mixed reception when Furtwängler introduced them in 1928.

Given that Schoenberg could never hope to make a living from composition, his job at the academy was well adapted to his needs. Perhaps in the long run he would not have stood the climate of Berlin, for in the winter of 1930–31 his asthma grew much worse, and he made so little progress in the summer that he was strongly advised not to risk the next winter in the north. So in October the Schoenbergs went to Barcelona to stay near Gerhard and his wife; various circumstances kept them there until May. However, it was not Schoenberg's health but politics that robbed him of any sense of security in Berlin. Anti-Semitism had contributed considerably to the hostility towards him in Vienna even before the war. In the early 1920s, when he experienced the grossly insulting behaviour towards Jews that Hitler's agitation was helping to make commonplace, he already foresaw violence as the probable outcome. By 1933 the realization of his fears had begun. It was no surprise when the government's intention to remove Jewish elements from the academy was announced at a meeting of the senate on 1 March, at which Schoenberg was present. He left abruptly, and treated the announcement as his dismissal. This took effect officially from the end of October, in breach of his contract, which should have protected him for another 23 months.

The Schoenbergs left Berlin in May and spent the summer in France. The only work composed at this time was the String Quartet Concerto after Handel. On 24 July Schoenberg returned to the Jewish faith, which he had rejected in favour of Lutheranism in 1898. His Christian beliefs had not lasted, but by his own account he was at no time unreligious, let alone anti-religious. By the war years religion had become his sole support. At first he did not attempt to reconcile his beliefs with those of any recognized faith, but with the increase of anti-Semitism after the war he realized that the faith in which he had been brought up must eventually claim him, and he began to work his way towards his own not entirely orthodox version of it. The ceremony in Paris merely made his reconversion official.

3. AMERICA. Schoenberg's search for employment ended with his acceptance of a teaching post until the next May at the Malkin Conservatory in Boston. The family arrived in the USA at the end of October. The work proved to be on a more elementary level than he had realized. Some of the classes were held in New York, which meant a tiring weekly journey there. As soon as the weather became bad in December his health deteriorated; he fell seriously ill in January and again in March. The summer put him right, but he dared not stay another winter on the east coast and, after two months at the Chautauqua Institution, a centre for religion, education and the arts in New York State, he moved to Los Angeles in September 1934 for the sake of the climate – a decision that probably added several years to his life. He first settled in Hollywood, where he completed the Suite for string orchestra by the end of the year. Private pupils soon began to come to him, and in the academic year 1935–6 he gave lectures at the University of Southern California. In 1936 he accepted a professorship in the University of California at Los Angeles, and moved to a house in Brentwood Park where he lived for the rest of his life. That year also saw the composition of the Fourth Quartet as well as the completion of the Violin Concerto, begun the previous spring or summer.

Though more fortunately placed in his country of exile than many of his fellow refugees, Schoenberg enjoyed little peace of mind. He found much in his alien surroundings hard to accept; few of his pupils were well enough grounded to benefit at all fully from his knowledge and experience; there was no audience for such music as he might write; above all there was the appalling news from Europe and the growing threat to relatives and friends there. His constant efforts on behalf of individual victims of persecution could not ease the sense of helplessness of one who was accustomed to take remedies into his own hands. For once he admitted to depression. In due course, however, he made some kind of truce with his situation. The war disposed in its own way of certain issues. His domestic happiness was a source of strength, and his young American children gave him a certain stake in the country. In the four years after 1936 his only original works had been Kol nidre, intended for synagogue use, and the completion of the Kammersymphonie no.2, partly composed between 1906 and 1916; but in 1941 he composed the Organ Variations in response to a commission, and three more works had followed by 1943. He also set about recasting material from various unfinished theoretical works in the form of a series of more strictly practical textbooks suitable for his American pupils. Nevertheless, in 1944 he was still thinking of emigrating.

This year was a turning-point in two respects. In February his health began to deteriorate sharply. Diabetes was diagnosed, he suffered from giddiness and fainting, and his asthma grew worse, as did the optical disturbances that had troubled him for some time. On reaching his 70th birthday in September he had to give up his professorship. As he had taught in the university for only eight years his pension was very small. Consequently he was obliged to continue giving private lessons, and in 1946 held a course of lectures at the University of Chicago.

In August that year he had a heart attack which caused his heart to stop beating; he was resuscitated only by an injection directly into the heart. This experience is in some sense reflected in the String Trio which he completed shortly after his recovery. Although he was well enough in the summer of 1948 to give classes at Santa Barbara, for most of his remaining five years he led the withdrawn existence of an invalid. But he had the satisfaction of seeing the emergence of the state of Israel (he was elected honorary president of the Israel Academy of Music in 1951), and also the upsurge of interest in his music that marked the postwar years. At this time he revised a small selection from his vast accumulation of largely unpublished essays and articles, and published it under the title Style and Idea. The few short compositions that he managed to complete were nearly all religious in inspiration. During the last year of his life he worked on a series of meditations which he originally called Moderne Psalmen, and later Psalmen, Gebete und Gespräche mit und über Gott; his last composition was an incomplete setting of the first of these.

4. PERSONALITY AND BELIEFS. The scanty recollections of those who knew Schoenberg in early years stress his enthusiasm and resilience. Although such qualities are only to be expected in a young man just finding scope for uncommon gifts, one circumstance behind Schoenberg's growing confidence during the decade before Verklärte Nacht claims attention for its fundamental influence on his later outlook and thinking: the fact that he was in all essentials self-taught. Fortune had endowed him not only with prodigious musical aptitude but with the intellectual energy and force of personality to ensure that it triumphed over his very considerable social and educational disadvantages. Naturally he took what steps he could to make up for his lack of formal musical training, but neither his haphazard reading, nor other odd crumbs of instruction (he is known, for instance, to have heard Bruckner lecture at the academy), nor even Zemlinsky's constant help, could alter his feeling that he never profited from what he was taught unless he had already discovered it for himself; tuition could at best only awaken him to his own knowledge. The process of independent discovery shaped his habits of mind and his spiritual life. His approach to composition, whether in the context of a single work or of his wider development, remained exploratory; he saw life as synonymous with change and religion as a quest.

His early experience is most closely reflected in, and so partly deducible from, his teaching methods. He refused to teach the codified knowledge that he had never learnt, mistrusting mere knowledge as the enemy of understanding. From the earliest stages his pupils were required to create, to derive their simplest exercise from an expressive intention and to remain true to the implications of the initial idea. Their teacher let no inconsequence pass, just as at a deeper level he would detect any transgression against the promptings of their musicality. For many of Schoenberg's pupils, particularly in the earlier years, the kind of moral obligation that he taught them to feel towards the demands of their art found an echo in their whole attitude to life, and they grouped themselves round him like a band of disciples. Their master benefited from the relationship too, for the origin of his lifelong interest in teaching lay in the need constantly to re-enact his own exploration of the resources of music. Just as many composers, himself among them, might exercise their contrapuntal skill in canonic problems, Schoenberg, who habitually thought in terms of processes rather than systems, practised the ability to reach outwards from a given starting-point by helping each pupil to work out his own salvation in accordance with his own personality and musical disposition.

It might be supposed that this approach to teaching would have led to great stylistic freedom, especially in view of his condemnation in the Harmonielehre of all academic rules as meaningless abstractions from the practice of a past era. However, he taught strictly within the confines of tonality, and made the principles of traditional grammar live again by demonstrating their functional value for his pupils' work as for that of the great Austrian and German composers, whom he constantly called to witness. His points of departure for technical instruction – Sechter in the Harmonielehre and Structural Functions of Harmony, Fux in Preliminary Exercises in Counterpoint, Classical forms in Models for Beginners in Composition and Fundamentals of Musical Composition – were relatively unimportant: everything depended on reinterpretation, on exploration through trial and error. His primary aim was to teach logical thinking, and that was best done in a context where theory, which must necessarily lag behind practice, could aid elucidation. Here again his teaching reflects his own position as a composer, which he was at pains to clarify in the Harmonielehre. He was convinced that the recent developments in his style, although reached intuitively, were a logical outcome of tradition, and that, while taking no account of rules, they observed fundamental laws which would eventually prove definable. Meanwhile the pupil who felt drawn to similar modes of expression must find his own intuitive path with the aid of self-reliance learnt in better-charted territory, and the listener would need faith.

In the crucial years preceding the Harmonielehre Schoenberg's music rarely met with faith or even the modicum of goodwill without which no artistic perception is possible. On the contrary, it was opposed with almost unbelievable persistence and venom. Perhaps no music before or since has encountered such a reception; to the end of his life its author, though internationally famous, had to accept very widespread incomprehension. The price he paid for artistic integrity was proportionately high. It should be remembered that the sense of outrage that even such a work as Pelleas und Melisande aroused at first in the majority of listeners arose not only from unthinking conservatism but from the more positive instinct that its premonitions of a radical disruption in the agreed basis of musical language carried a threat to precision of meaning. Schoenberg, who shared his audience's background and many of its assumptions, understood its fears and so experienced its attack with something like the force of an inner doubt, requiring all the more courage to parry. He felt himself impelled towards the break with tonality almost despite himself, and accomplished it only after considerable hesitation. Since its systematic justification in theory eluded him he looked for some other authority to protect his intuition. He found it eventually in religion.

In the year after Mahler's death in 1911 Schoenberg wrote about him in terms that indicate clearly his preoccupations at that time. He attacked with great bitterness those whose ceaseless denigration of Mahler almost led him to lose faith in his own work, and apostrophized him as saint and martyr. He saw all great music as expressing the longing of the soul for God, and genius as representing man's more spiritual future, so that the uncomprehending present must inevitably persecute the good and promote the bad. His quotation of Mahler's remark that the Eighth Symphony was composed at great speed, almost as though from dictation, is especially significant, for he too composed very quickly, often with the feeling that however much effort he put into his work something more was given that he could not account for, just as his stylistic development seemed to have been taken out of his hands. It was not only Mahler and his great predecessors whom he had come to see as divinely inspired: his admission that the role of the 'chosen one' in Die Jakobsleiter was based on his own experience removes any doubt that he placed himself in their company. (However, Mahler's music never influenced his own at all deeply, and his sympathy for it sometimes wavered – to his discomfort, because he linked entitlement to respect with the ability to accord it.)

Schoenberg's need to understand his artistic role can scarcely have been the only factor in the spiritual crisis that led to his rediscovery of religious faith: it is merely the one to which his work and writings give access. Similarly the ideas embodied in the prose drama Der biblische Weg and in Moses und Aron cannot fully document the return to Judaism as a result of which religion became his support in racial as in artistic persecution. The decision to make this return official proved a difficult one because it seemed to set the seal on his divorce from the Western tradition which had nurtured him and to which he had contributed so powerfully. In reaction he even spoke at the time of giving up composition and devoting himself to the Jewish national cause. That did not happen, but for more than a decade he continued to urge the claims of Der biblische Weg as an instrument of propaganda, and to promote the idea of a militant United Jewish Party of which he would be leader on the model of the chief protagonist in his play, Max Aruns. His personal and racial idealism remained closely intertwined to the end of his life, as a letter written within three months of his death to the Israel Academy of Music shows:

> Those who issue from such an institution must be truly priests of art, approaching art in the same spirit of consecration as the priest approaches God's altar. For just as God chose Israel to be the people whose task it is to maintain the pure, true, Mosaic monotheism despite all persecution, despite all affliction, so too it is the task of Israeli musicians to set the world an example of the old kind that can make our souls function again as they must if mankind is to evolve any higher.

The idea of the artist as priest or prophet is often deprecated as inflated, complacent, arrogant or presumptuous. But no reader of Die Jakobsleiter and Moses und Aron will imagine that Schoenberg looked for cheap self-justification or easy solutions to spiritual or artistic problems. The path that had been pointed out to him was unmarked, to be followed blindfold and often with anguish, in the knowledge that it would be lost the moment faith faltered. Moreover the need to protect the supremacy of faith came into conflict with the urge to rationalize and justify: faith must fear conscious constraints yet needed the support of discipline, which must accordingly in some sense cross the divide between the rational and the intuitive. This ultimately irresoluble tension ran all through Schoenberg's thinking and showed itself in many guises. It lies, for instance, at the heart of the 12-note method, where every note is brought within the law, but in such a way that intuition retains its freedom. And an analogous dichotomy provides the subject of Moses und Aron, which concerns the simultaneous duty and impossibility of giving expression to inexpressible truths.

Unhappily Schoenberg's struggle to realize his ideals dominated not only his spiritual but his social life, where the humility belonging to the former too often deserted him. He could not ignore misunderstanding, but fought back. As he said himself in a letter of 1924:

> Unfortunately the better sort of people become enemies faster than friends because everything is so serious and important to them that they are perpetually in a defensive position. They are driven to this by the great, indeed ruthless honesty with which they treat themselves and which makes them adopt the same attitude to other people as well. It is very wrong, really, for we human beings are far too much in need of tolerance for any thoroughgoing honesty to he helpful to us. If only we could manage to be wise enough to put people on probation instead of condemning them, if we could only give proven friends such extended credit! – I am speaking of my own defects, knowing very well why I have often been more lonely than could well be pleasant.

Even here he seems to miss the implication of his habitual insistence on his place among 'better' people: to expect respect is to discourage it even in those who recognize that it is due. He did not make life easy for his adherents, regarding interest in modern music beyond that of his own circle as betrayal. No doubt it was true that the contemporary listeners or performers prepared to devote themselves wholeheartedly to Schoenberg's music would have found it almost as difficult as the composer himself to sympathize with other modes of thought, but he must sometimes have driven away genuine well-wishers along with the opportunists. His enjoyment of his months in Barcelona in 1931–2 arose partly from relief at escaping from the pedestal that he had built for himself in Berlin, and being accepted as an equal by people who knew little about him.

Readers of Schoenberg's posthumously published correspondence, however, discover not only his less accommodating side but much that only the more fortunate of his contemporaries could know: his absolute honesty in all his dealings, his generosity of mind wherever he sensed integrity, his delicacy of feeling where he saw the need to temper his customary directness, his energy in expressing sympathy through practical help, his capacity for gratitude, his loyalty. His critical and aesthetic writings, turning as they invariably do on matters that concern him deeply, reveal his personality no less vividly, displaying the same rather lofty yet compelling idealism, the same irascible pride, the same flashes of humour and warmth, the same justice within the framework of strongly held convictions. His thinking here is at all times a creator's, never that of the historian concerned to give everything its place. He is content to speak as an individual, with a more selfconscious view of his relation to tradition than his predecessors enjoyed, but still with the confidence of one who knows where he stands. Integrity of personality enables limitations in his historical sympathies, and even inconsistencies in the logic on which he naively though not unjustifiably prided himself, to fall into place beside his unique insights into the music that he valued and the musical crisis in which he found himself involved. The special perceptions that distinguish his writing arise directly out of his experience in composition, and so, it would seem, despite a debt to Karl Kraus, does his manner of presentation, at once direct and cogent yet unexpected and elliptical. And that is hardly surprising, since it is in music that his mind and spirit found their fullest expression.

5. Early tonal works. Schoenberg's music may be divided into four periods, the second and third of which were inaugurated by crises in compositional technique that had important consequences not only for the composer's own work but for music in general. The music of the first period is tonal, or at least employs a tonality as a central point of reference. In 1908 Schoenberg abandoned tonality; he was the first composer to do so. The music of the ensuing second period is often called 'atonal'. Schoenberg considered this term nonsensical, preferring 'pantonal'. Since either term properly embraces his serial music as well, the period will be referred to here as 'expressionist'. From his work of this time he gradually evolved the principle of serialism, which he first used consistently in 1920; the serial music written between that date and 1936 constitutes the third period. The fourth, less well defined phase may be said to emerge during the 1930s. It is marked by greater stylistic diversity, including occasional returns to tonal composition.

Of the considerable quantity of music that Schoenberg is known to have composed from childhood to his early 20s relatively little survives, and some of that is fragmentary. Unfinished pieces remained with the composer, whereas completed ones were played with friends and lost: for instance only one movement from the four or five string quartets that he remembered having composed before the D major work of 1897 is known. The songs have fared better, but as Schoenberg had not yet acquired the habit of dating his manuscripts the course of his early development can be traced only in outline. Youthful attempts at violin duets and a more ambitious Lied ohne Worte for piano give ample evidence of his lack of instruction and severely limited musical background. Indeed, if the piano piece is the one he mentioned as new in 1891, as seems possible, it is extraordinarily crude for a 16-year old, though to cover the immense distance to the two songs securely dated 1893 in only two years would not have been untypical of him. Not that these show outstanding promise, but they establish a mode of fairly conventional, and as time went on increasingly Brahmsian, songwriting which he cultivated intensely during the next four years and gradually mastered. Initially his attempts to give point to the conventional sentiments of the mostly amorous verses sometimes resulted in awkward harmonic shifts and modulations; his formal sense developed sooner, typically in three-stanza settings, in which straightforward ternary structures with some modification at the close are often well handled.

The three piano pieces of 1894 are also ternary structures, though more elaborate ones presumably inspired by Brahms's sets published in the previous two years. They show a good grasp of the possibilities offered at the lead-back and coda, but clumsy execution not helped by uncertain feeling for piano textures. Attempts at more original effects – the links between the coda of each piece and the beginning of its successor, the metrical experiments in the first piece and the diminution in the last – sound distinctly forced. In the roughly contemporaneous string quartet Presto in C quite different strengths begin to appear. Despite the relatively plain and stiffly foursquare melody and harmony the long spans of the big sonata-rondo are sketched out easily and naturally with considerable motivic skill.

Heuberger, however, to whom Schoenberg showed some songs at about this time, advised him to write some short pieces in the style of Schubert. Schoenberg clearly took the point that he must learn complete control by testing his every step, and composed the six little pieces for piano duet. He subjugated himself here to the same discipline that half a century later he was still advocating in Models for Beginners in Composition and Fundamentals of Musical Composition. Each melody progresses by drawing on its own motivic resources, which also permeate the accompaniment, and the consequences of every harmony are carefully weighed. The pieces (except no.5) are arranged in ascending order of formal development. The first consists simply of two repeated eight-bar strains. In each subsequent piece there is a little more expansion after the double bar, culminating in tiny contrasting episodes in nos.4 and 6. Only in these two pieces is the slightest deviation from four-bar phraseology admitted. Throughout his life, and especially after 1920, Schoenberg's music drew strength from his acute sensitivity to phrase structure, shifts of emphasis within a regular rhythmic framework and the tensions arising from asymmetry. In the duets he set about sharpening a faculty that some of the solo piano pieces and songs show to have been innate.

From 1896 Schoenberg began composing for rather larger ensembles. A Notturno for solo violin and strings, presumably identifiable with the extant Adagio for that combination, was conducted by Zemlinsky at a 'Polyhymnia' concert in March. In September Schoenberg completed the short first movement of a Serenade for small orchestra, and the following March wrote a Gavotte and Musette for strings in which his liking for strettos and inversions is already apparent. This year, 1897, may be said to mark the end of Schoenberg's apprenticeship in vocal and instrumental composition alike. Two settings of Heyse belong to it (almost certainly), and two of Dehmel. They are very accomplished essays broadly in Brahms's manner, though overstepping it a little in both declamation and tonal procedure where Dehmel's less regular verse invites freer treatment. Brahms is likewise still the dominant influence in the D major String Quartet (and its rejected F major scherzo), composed in the summer and autumn. But this work represents a huge stride forward, even over the recent Serenade movement. The composer himself recognized it as a turning-point and remembered it with affection. It owes its Classical four-movement layout to Brahms's mediation, its structural cogency and clarity derive from him, and so to a large extent does the style, though certain themes speak with a strong Czech accent. Yet there is a freedom of movement, a deftly guided fluency, that does not belong to the older master's closely considered manner, and it is here that Schoenberg's musical personality asserts itself most strikingly. His sheer zest in the making of music is one of his most persistent characteristics: it accounts for the feeling of resilience that accompanies his exploration of even the darkest regions of experience and tempers his findings. If the D major Quartet, delightful though it is, does not seem fully typical of him it is due less to the eclectic idiom than to the absence of another constant factor in his music: the sense of urgency in communicating a particular conception.

This quality, however, begins to make itself felt in the pair of lengthy songs which Schoenberg wrote in the following year and eventually selected as his op.1. The effort to match the magniloquent sentiments of the verses called forth better things from the young composer than they deserved. True, the naivety that prompted the choice of text comes through, rather endearingly, in the setting. But although the Wagnerian influence that was to loom so large in the next few years is already perceptible, there is no close model for the firm sonata-influenced forms, the wealth of independent contrapuntal development in the accompaniments or the distinctive breadth and warmth of the asymmetrical melodic lines. The impact of Wagner is still more obvious in the contemporary Frühlings Tod, an unfinished symphonic poem in much of which the Schoenberg of the early orchestral works that were soon to follow is clearly audible.

Schoenberg found inspiration for several compositions of 1899 in poems by Dehmel: the songs Mannesbangen, which he did not publish, Warnung (in its first version), Erwartung, Schenk mir deinen goldenen Kamm and Erhebung, and the string sextet Verklärte Nacht. (The charming Waldsonne of about this time is not a Dehmel song and stands apart.) The desire to give expression to the feelings aroused in him by Dehmel's work considerably influenced the development of his style, as he later confessed to the poet. The songs, to more overtly erotic texts than he had set before, revert to a more succinct style of word-setting than that of op.1. Their concentration of mood and means shows one kind of advance, the expansive textures of Verklärte Nacht, in which Wagnerian and Brahmsian modes of thought meet in harmonious accord, a contrasting one. In the Dehmel poem that served as the basis for this symphonic poem a woman confesses to her lover that she is already pregnant by another man, and he replies that through their love the child will be born his own. A knowledge of this unlikely tale is of secondary importance to the listener because the lack of action enables the work to be understood as a single-movement abstract composition. No composer understood better than Schoenberg did that music serves its subject best when claiming the greatest possible autonomy for itself.

In March 1900 Schoenberg began setting Jens Peter Jacobsen's Gurre-Lieder as a song cycle for voice and piano, for entry in a competition. In accordance with the ballad-like tone of the verse he built the vocal lines from relatively simple rhythmic elements, a style shared by the songs Hochzeitslied and Freihold of about the same time, and perhaps suggested by some of Zemlinsky's early songs. However, Schoenberg soon saw wider possibilities in the text. Having fallen under Wagner's spell he felt the need for subjects that transcended common experience, his first thought being to wring something more from such well-worn themes as love, death and transfiguration. The way lay through mastery and reinterpretation of Wagnerian style, and the Gurre-Lieder offered a far more expansive arena for this important confrontation than Verklärte Nacht had done. He therefore decided to connect the songs he had already composed (those in the first two parts of the finished work) with symphonic interludes and set the whole poem as a vast cantata employing several soloists and a huge chorus and orchestra.

The work depicts the love of King Waldemar and Tove under the Tristanesque imminence of death, Waldemar's blasphemous defiance of God after Tove's death, the nightly ride at the head of a ghostly retinue to which the king's restless spirit is subsequently condemned, and its dismissal by the summer wind at the approach of day. Schoenberg encompassed all this in a series of tableaux of extraordinary magnificence. But the poem deals with dramatic events in an undramatic form and so required some kind of interpretative emphasis to bring the great musical design clearly into focus. The opportunity was there, for at some level Schoenberg's choice of the poem must surely have been influenced by Waldemar's rebellion against God and the renewal brought about as the summer wind sweeps away the aftermath of human passion – both themes that border on his religious concerns of a few years later. Yet neither emerges with unifying force, whether because he was unable to commit himself fully to the text or through inexperience in dramatic matters. As late as 1913 he could still write to Zemlinsky that he did not consider himself a dramatic composer in the ordinary sense. In the Gurre-Lieder he tended to fall back on direct reminiscence of Wagner's later operas, especially Götterdämmerung, to evoke atmosphere or characterize events. It is significant that after considering an opera on Maeterlinck's Pelléas et Mélisande for his next work (he knew nothing of Debussy's opera), he rejected the idea in favour of a symphonic poem on the same subject.

Schoenberg later said that it was Maeterlinck's ability to lend timelessness to perennial human problems that had attracted him to the play. Certainly it was precisely the moments least involved with the action that inspired him to step furthest outside his own chronology towards his stylistic future, for instance in the music associated with Mélisande's first mysterious appearance heard at the outset and again before her death. But such music as Golaud's, and that of the main love scene, is less advanced; it is capable of traditional extension, notably through Wagnerian sequence, and therefore well adapted to carry the narrative. The contrapuntal virtuosity surpasses even that of the Gurre-Lieder, constantly changing the expressive colour of the thematic material in a manner that is entirely individual while paying tribute to Wagner – rather than to Strauss, whose influence appears sporadically on a more superficial level. Yet for all its riches the work contains a structural conflict. The Mélisande and Pelléas themes lose something of their essence as they are drawn into the larger contrapuntal development, a process that may fit the symbolism of the work but also suggests that the composer had not yet mastered the potentialities of his more striking inventions.

Schoenberg now returned to songwriting. The songs of the next three years fall into three groups. Those of the first group, dating from 1903 and the earlier months of 1904, explore various subjects. Wie Georg von Frundsberg and Das Wappenschild, a fiery showpiece with orchestra, follow the lead of Freihold as songs of defiance. They must surely contain the composer's reaction to hostility; perhaps the gloomy Verlassen does so too in a different way. Die Aufgeregten reflects ironically on human passion, though love remains the theme of some of the most beautiful of these songs. Geübtes Herz, Traumleben and the orchestral Natur cultivate the intense lyrical style first heard in Schenk mir deinen goldenen Kamm. Ghasel continues this line, but with a change of emphasis in the accompaniment, which involves the voice part in imitation and adopts its even flow. The three Petrarch sonnets from op.8, composed in the later part of 1904 when the D minor String Quartet was already under way, form a distinct group set a little apart from Schoenberg's other songs. Their contrapuntal style derives directly from Ghasel, but takes a far more complex form made possible by the orchestral setting.

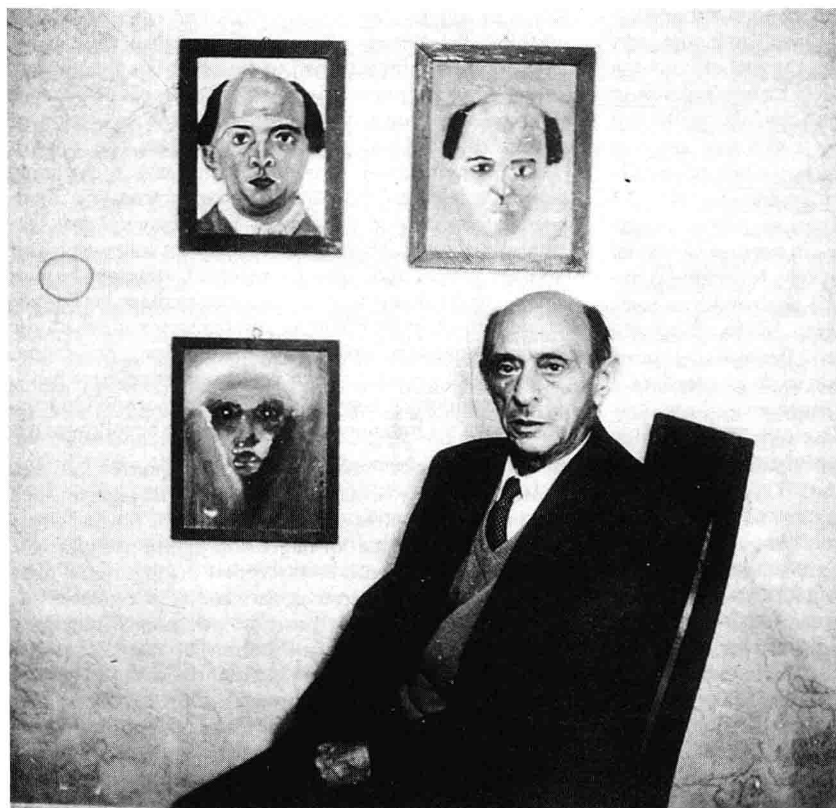
In the third group, dating from 1905, the vocal lines regain their independence, relying on motifs rather than imitation to relate them to their accompaniments. Except for the slightly earlier orchestral Sehnsucht all these songs, which are based on a curious assortment of serious and trivial verses, were composed about the time of the completion of the D minor Quartet, and already show the characteristics of Schoenberg's tonal thinking in its last stages. His early liking for chromatic approaches to diatonic notes, strikingly manifested as early as Erwartung (1899), had led to ever-increasing chromatic substitution, especially in the melodic field. This in turn required clarification by correspondingly elaborate harmonization, employing so wide a range of primary and altered degrees within the tonality that modulation lost its force. So his music, which had at no time inclined to constant modulation, became increasingly monotonal. This tendency appears in all the songs, but in two contrasting forms: in Der Wanderer, Am Wegrand (later quoted in the monodrama Erwartung) and Mädchenlied, as in Verlassen of 1903, the tonal centre is strongly, sometimes almost obsessively stressed, whereas in Sehnsucht, Alles and Lockung it is scarcely touched on.

The D minor Quartet, Schoenberg's first wholly characteristic and assured large-scale masterpiece, consists, like Pelleas und Melisande, of a single vast movement, but naturally without illustrative interludes. A scherzo, slow movement and rondo are interspersed at various points between the first part of the development and the coda of what would normally have been the first movement, and absorbed into it by the use of common material. The general idea for such a form originates in Liszt, whose novel formal concepts Schoenberg admired while finding his attempts to put them into practice schematic and unfelt. But the quartet arose more directly from Schoenberg's fundamental preference for abstract composition, or at least unspoken programmes, reasserting itself and acting upon his recent cultivation of the Straussian symphonic poem. The twin formative influences of Wagner and Brahms once again find an even balance, as they had in Verklärte Nacht, but now completely and finally assimilated. Perhaps the most striking single quality of this work is its extraordinary melodic breadth. As the melodies move away from their initial, firmly tonal contexts, develop, and combine contrapuntally, they form what Schoenberg called vagrant harmonies; the music, though not very dissonant, loses tonal definition. Thus the structure cannot be understood entirely in tonal terms. Its powerful sense of direction is maintained through the composer's exceptional capacity to shape his material in relation to its formal purpose, a capacity that after his abandonment of tonality was to prove strong enough to carry a far heavier structural burden. Late in life he remarked that he had never been content to introduce an idea for structural reasons alone: it must always make a positive contribution to the substance of the work. The D minor Quartet already displays the typical Schoenbergian richness fostered by this habit of mind.

The Kammersymphonie no.1, completed in July 1906, adopts the quartet's single-movement layout, but in a more concise form; though in no way a slighter work it is barely half as long. Schoenberg aimed here at concentration rather than expansiveness and, as he was so often to do in solving the problems posed by a particular conception, opened up possibilities for the future remote from his immediate artistic concern. In the first place he increased his instrumental forces from four to 15 in order to accommodate the simultaneous presentation of a greater concentration of ideas. Viewed from another angle, however, the increase appears as a reduction: it established the soloistic orchestral writing already found here and there in the Gurre-Lieder and Pelleas, and opened the way for the small, strongly differentiated instrumental ensembles appropriate to Schoenberg's later style – and that of many younger composers. But the urge towards concentration affected deeper levels in his musical thought. The two opening themes are based respectively on superimposed perfect 4ths and the whole-tone scale, both of which readily form chordal structures. The distinction between the melodic and harmonic dimensions thus becomes blurred, a process closely bound up with the loss of tonality in Schoenberg's music. However, for the moment the E major frame held.



Although the imminence of change may seem obvious to the listener with hindsight, it was not so to the composer. On completing this exuberant work he felt that he had now arrived at a settled style. The music of the next year or so reflects this conviction. In neither the eight-part chorus Friede auf Erden, which he later described as an illusion written when he still thought harmony among men conceivable, nor in the Zwei Balladen op.12, does the threat to tonality grow appreciably. Schoenberg always regretted that he had not had time to follow up all the implications of the style of this period, and 30 years later returned to the task. For the present, however, some inner crisis urged him towards new realms of expression and hastened the inevitable revolution. A change of mood had made itself felt earlier. The songs of 1905, for instance, provide an uneasy, questioning interlude between the confident first quartet and Kammersymphonie, and the second Kammersymphonie, begun immediately after the first, opens in a new spirit of sombre resignation. Despite repeated attempts he was unable to finish this work at the time, perhaps because he could not reconcile the more carefree spirit in which the second movement opens with his changing preoccupations. At all events it was a very intimate, elusive piece, the contemporary first movement of the Second Quartet, that spoke for him now and demanded to be followed up.

6. Expressionist works. The new quartet did not, however, occupy his whole attention; it was not finished until the later months of 1908. At the same time he wrote songs and developed an interest in painting. By far the greater part of his work in this sphere belongs to the years 1908–10, when his music underwent its first great crisis. The pictures are mostly portraits or strange, imaginary heads – 'visions' as he called some of them. They are amateurish in execution yet sufficiently skilful to convey the intensity of his imagination, and it seems likely that their importance to him lay in this very opposition. This was a time when artists and writers who were later to be called Expressionists sought to obey the promptings of the spirit ever more directly, in some sense bypassing the machinery of artistic tradition in order to reach deeper levels of experience. The relation to tradition remained, of course, the crucial factor: as a painter Schoenberg's amateur status severely limited the scope and quality of his achievement, but allowed him to feel that his hand was guided without his conscious intervention, whereas in music he had to pay for the benefits of mastery by reckoning with its censorship. So for a time his method of painting represented the ideal towards which his real work of composition aspired.

In the winter of 1907–8 Schoenberg interrupted work on the scherzo of the Second Quartet to compose the Zwei Lieder op.14. They are highly imitative pieces, the second reminiscent of Ghasel in texture. As in some of the songs of 1905 tonic harmony scarcely appears until the close and now exerts still less gravitational force. Certain dissonances, notably perfect and altered 4th chords, resolve so tardily and so variously as to weaken expectation of their doing so at all. This process reached its logical conclusion shortly afterwards in songs from Das Buch der hängenden Gärten, at least five of which (nos.4, 5, 3, 8, 7) are known to date from March and April 1908. Here dissonance is finally emancipated, that is, it no longer seeks the justification of resolution. Consequently structural harmony disappears, along with its need for measured periods and consistent textures, and so does tonality itself as a central point of reference. By way of compensation motivic work and the tendency to equate the horizontal and vertical dimensions – in fact the essential elements later codified in the serial method – assume greater responsibility. The poems by George that led Schoenberg to explore the untried expressive possibilities of free dissonance describe in rather indirect language the growth of a passion in an exotic setting and the subsequent parting. Neither poet nor composer wishes to arouse sympathy or evoke ecstasy. The songs are predominantly slow and quiet, the lack of tonal or rhythmic propulsion placing them outside time. Each one captures with peculiar vividness the shifts of feeling at a particular moment, but distanced, as though enshrined in the limbo of past experience. There is nothing of Waldemar and Tove here: the summer wind will assuredly soon sweep all before it. What will be left? Schoenberg gave his answer in the Second Quartet, one of the most personal of all his works.

This quartet consists of four thematically related movements which successively reflect the transformation of his style, but do not further it. The third movement is later but less advanced than the op.14 songs, and the finale, though tonal only in parts, stands in the same relation to the earlier songs of Das Buch der hängenden Gärten. The reason for this lies not only in the technical consideration that the later movements could not overstep certain limits set by the enigmatic first movement, which is in F♯ minor: the composer may have needed to step back in order to see the crisis that had overtaken him clearly. For even though the sequence of events in his wife's liaison with Gerstl cannot be exactly dated, so that its precise relation to the quartet's composition cannot be established, the crisis appears to be the subject of the work. The incorporation in the trio of the scherzo of the popular melody O du lieber Augustin, the words of which end with the tag 'Alles ist hin', would fit this interpretation, as would the George poems set for soprano voice in the two later movements, the first a prayer for divine solace after earthly struggles, the second a vision of the spirit's journey to ethereal realms. Although Schoenberg's choice of subject for his next vocal works was to be directed towards human insights, he evidently recognized already that his ultimate aim was religious.

Early in 1909 Schoenberg composed the first two piano pieces of op.11, before completing Das Buch der hängenden Gärten. The Fünf Orchesterstücke op.16 and the third piece of op.11 followed in the summer. The strange note of resignation that had sounded through the song cycle is still heard in op.11 nos.1 and 2 and op.16 no.2, but the unfamiliar territory of the new style now takes in the explosive turmoil of op.16 nos.1 and 4 and op.11 no.3, and the unique calm of op.16 no.3. Formal expansion does not accompany the extension of expressive range: as Schoenberg later observed, brevity and intensity of expression are interdependent in these pieces. The disintegration of functional harmony appeared at the time to have destroyed the conditions for large-scale form. But other features with roots in traditional practice, in particular fixed points of reference of various kinds (some of them reminiscent of tonality) and thematic or motivic development, survived to assume not only greater responsibility but new guises. These made possible swifter transformations and more abrupt contrasts than music had hitherto known. Moreover dissonance's new independence permitted, at least in an orchestral context, unprecedented simultaneous contrasts. It is not only novelty of expression in itself but the power to bring seemingly irreconcilable elements into relation that gives the music its visionary quality, far beyond that of the painted 'visions'.

For a time Schoenberg believed that by following the dictates of expression he would be able to renounce motivic features as well as tonality. The last two pieces in opp.11 and 16 to be written, the final piece in each set, show the direction of his thinking. The orchestral piece centres on a continuously evolving melodic line with no clear expository stage; the piano piece relies for coherence as much on dynamics and texture as on pattern. From this point two possibilities suggested themselves. One was to devise ideas that were complete in themselves and required no development. This held no lasting attraction for a composer of Schoenberg's imaginative fecundity. He composed two tiny pieces for chamber ensemble and part of a third early in 1910, and the next year six equally minute piano pieces which he published as op.19; thereafter he left this line of thought to Webern. For Schoenberg the way forward lay in the construction of large forms on the basis of a text. This allowed him scope to build on the experience of opp.11 and 16. Immediately after the instrumental pieces he composed in the astonishingly short time of 17 days the half-hour monodrama Erwartung.

The single character in this piece is an unnamed woman. Full of fear and apprehension, she is wandering through a forest at night in search of her lover. The only dramatic event, her discovery of his murdered body, occurs at a fairly early stage; the rest of her monologue passes from recollection of their love, through jealousy to a sense of reconciliation born of exhaustion. As the composer remarked, the whole drama may be understood as a nightmare, but the point is immaterial because the reality explored is purely psychological. There is no realistic time scale: past and present co-exist and merge in the woman's mind as terror, desire, jealousy and tenderness cut across one another in confused association. Traditional tonal order could scarcely have met the demands of such a subject: Schoenberg's extraordinary score depends to a considerable extent upon a rationality beyond conscious control. True, various unifying factors are observable, such as fixed pitch elements that turn upon a vestigial D minor (his favourite key throughout his life, whether in tonal, freely pantonal or serial composition) and a number of motivic figures that recur time and again, especially at the beginning of phrases. But since these are short, widely scattered and quickly submerged in the stream of continuous development their contribution to coherence at surface level is small; the music can scarcely be called athematic, but it goes further in that direction than any other work of Schoenberg. The monologue falls into several lengthy paragraphs which provide the clearest structural feature, but even here divisions are blurred and larger changes of mood disrupted by innumerable contradictory emotions. Beyond a certain point nothing can impinge upon the dreamlike continuum of musical images.

The next year, 1910, Schoenberg wrote the text of Die glückliche Hand, and began the music soon after, though he did not finish it for three years. It is a companion-piece to Erwartung, in effect another monodrama, centring on an unnamed man. Though shorter it requires more elaborate staging, including an intricate play of coloured lighting synchronized with the action. The subsidiary roles – a woman, a gentleman and some workers – are mimed, since they are merely projections of the man's psyche, but the chorus of 12 soloists, whose commentary opens and closes the drama, reveals through its pity of him that it represents an independent, presumably divine order of existence. At the beginning the chorus asks why he constantly betrays his capacity for the supermundane in a vain quest for earthly happiness. The main action symbolizes this situation. The man loves a woman who deserts him for a rival, but seems to return to him. In the mistaken belief that he has won her he finds strength to withstand his enemies and inspiration for artistic creation. His resulting work is symbolized by a trinket; it excites envy, but he recognizes it as meretricious. The woman plays him false and the cycle is complete. Although the style of the music is close to that of Erwartung, Schoenberg reintroduces features that he had temporarily set aside, to meet the more varied action and the wider implications of the text. Clear formal divisions reassert themselves: recapitulatory reminiscence plays an important part in the later stages of the action and there are correspondences between the flanking choral scenes, where exact imitation reappears. There is also a new element, barely hinted at in the works of 1909: the use of parody to characterize such situations as the metal working and the woman's fickleness.

Parody assumes a very important role in Pierrot lunaire. This work, composed in 1912, before the framing choral scenes of Die glückliche Hand, consists of 21 poems set for speaker and chamber ensemble. Schoenberg had employed melodrama before in the summer wind narrative of the Gurre-Lieder. His highly stylized use of the speaking voice, for which he notated relative pitches as well as exact rhythms, proved an ideal vehicle for the Pierrot settings, which were conceived in what he described as a light, ironic–satirical tone. The rather modish verses, by turns grotesque, macabre or consciously sentimental, provide the occasion for presenting, with the detachment that the protagonist in Die glückliche Hand failed to achieve, human activity as a shadow play in which menace and absurdity are on a level. The focus shifts at random, as in a dream, between the lunatic activities of the clown, impersonal scenes, the poet in the first person and the self-absorbed artist, who is not spared. Within his new style Schoenberg parodies the characteristics of a great range of genre pieces, very often retaining the ghost of their formal layout as well. In music the lines dividing ironic from direct reference are often hard to detect. The peculiar fascination of Pierrot lunaire lies in this ambiguity. The nightmare imagery of some of the poems might scarcely be admissible without ironic distancing, yet the music often strikes with authentic horror. Mockery constantly shades into good humour, exaggerated pathos into the genuinely touching. A decade later Schoenberg was to rediscover his sympathy for the world that he was now determined to leave behind him. For the moment, however, he was set on other things.

After Pierrot Schoenberg contemplated writing an oratorio based on the vision of Swedenborg's heaven at the end of Balzac's novel Séraphita. This idea was superseded during 1914 by plans for a vast, partly choral symphony of a religious nature, incorporating texts from Dehmel, Tagore and the Old Testament. Early in 1915 he wrote words for a new final section consisting of two movements entitled Totentanz der Prinzipien and Die Jakobsleiter, but although he made extensive sketches nothing came to fruition until he decided to make his own statement of faith by turning Die Jakobsleiter into an independent oratorio. He began to revise the text in 1916 and composed the first half the next year. At the beginning of the allegory, which owes a good deal to Balzac's Séraphita, a host of people approaching death come before the archangel Gabriel, who admonishes and advises them. Six representatives of various philosophical standpoints then come forward to recount their earthly experiences and aspirations, and receive his comments. There is no doubt something of Schoenberg in all of them, and in Gabriel too, but he avowedly identified himself with the 'chosen one', whose spiritual understanding sets him apart and whose word seems doomed to misunderstanding. A central symphonic interlude symbolizing the transition from this world to the hereafter leads to the uncomposed second part in which souls are prepared for reincarnation as the next step in their long spiritual pilgrimage towards ultimate perfection. The chosen one is reluctant to face the world again, once more to stand alone and find himself involuntarily compelled, though receiving no support, to speak and do what he would never have dared to think or take responsibility for. But he is told to remember all that he has in common with the rest of humanity and to accept his prophetic role. At the close Gabriel calls on every soul to seek unity with God through prayer.

The faith and the view of his mission to which Schoenberg gave expression in Die Jakobsleiter were to influence the whole course of his later development as a composer. The short score of the first part, however, is more easily seen as a potential culmination to the music composed since 1908 than as a foretaste of that of the 1920s. The closing section of Die glückliche Hand provided a model for the big, partly sung, partly spoken choruses. The long paragraphs sung or spoken by the soloists required a more sustained style of writing than that, for instance, of Erwartung, where the varying intensity of dissonance breaks continuity of pace and texture. For this Schoenberg was able to turn to the four orchestral songs of op.22 (1913–16) and their forerunner Herzgewächse (1911), where he had already devised more even textures by maintaining a rather high level of dissonance in six or more parts, with very little octave doubling and a tendency towards symmetrically built chords. Except for Seraphita (op.22 no.1) all these songs anticipate the religious preoccupation of Die Jakobsleiter. The very high soprano voice that symbolizes prayer in Herzgewächse reappears as the soul that ascends heavenward just before the central interlude. In January 1915 Schoenberg wrote to Zemlinsky that his new symphony would be 'worked' ('ein gearbeitetes Werk') in contrast to his many 'purely impressionistic' recent works. He carried this resolve over into the oratorio. His brief exploration of the dream world of free association had permanently enriched his musical language and vision, but he now needed to regain greater formal elaboration and density of meaning. Although Die Jakobsleiter, like the monodramas before it, relies primarily on the text for its structure, it employs recurrent themes and melodies, often in contrapuntal combination. Many of these are related through permutations of a hexachord heard at the outset.

At one point in the unfinished central interlude Schoenberg directed that groups of instruments placed at a distance should enter in 'floating' ('schwebend') rhythm not exactly synchronized with that of the main orchestra. The suspension of rhythmic propulsion symbolizes the dissolution of earthly ties on the threshold of the hereafter. How far Schoenberg would have been able to pass beyond this extraordinary conception into the Swedenborgian heaven of his text had he not been interrupted, it is impossible to say, though the history of Moses und Aron suggests that he would not have reached the end. But the 12-note serial method that increasingly occupied him from 1921 provided a continuation of another sort. The omnipresent series sought to establish as principles the equation of the horizontal and vertical aspects of music, and the unity of all ideas in a composition with each other and with their context. Schoenberg expressly compared the unity of musical space to Swedenborg's concept of heaven where 'there is no absolute down, no right or left, forward or backward'. In a different sense from the symphonic interlude the music must 'float'. The dodecaphonic aspect counteracted the pull of tonal gravity; the only quasi-tonal music in Die Jakobsleiter belongs to 'one of the called', who is roundly rebuked for preferring beauty to truth. In June 1922, shortly before he gave up trying to continue the oratorio, but when his foot was already firmly on the serial path, Schoenberg started a new sketchbook by inscribing the cover with the words 'Mit Gott'.

7. Serial and tonal works, 1920–36. Since serialism is a method of composition and does not dictate style, Schoenberg might have been expected to find in it the means, if not of completing Die Jakobsleiter, at least of continuing in some direction suggested by that work. Instead he evolved a form of neo-classicism. This may not have been his original intention. The Klavierstücke op.23 nos.1, 2 and 4, written or begun in July 1920, are descendants of the pre-war instrumental pieces, and exactly a year later he began the Suite op.25, also for piano, with the only two movements (the Prelude and Intermezzo) that are not dance movements, thinking of the work simply as a second set of pieces. However, the Variations and Tanzszene from the Serenade op.24 had been begun in the later months of 1920, the March followed in September 1921, and by the time all three works were finished in the early part of 1923 movements based on Classical forms predominated. Although every piece in opp.23 and 24 involves serial procedures, only one in each work uses a 12-note series. Both of these postdate the earliest movements of the Suite, which, like nearly everything that Schoenberg was to compose in the next ten years, is dodecaphonic throughout.

The reason for Schoenberg's return to Classical forms must be sought in his need to find new scope for his inherently developmental cast of thought. Paradoxically, developing variation had brought about, above all in the later works of 1909, a reduction in the conditions for its own exercise. Where every motif is transformed before it can gather associations for the listener there can be no intensification of meaning through development; where no pattern establishes itself only extreme contrasts cheat expectation, and then not for long. If Schoenberg's art of development was to develop further it needed a basis in relative stability, especially in the rhythmic sphere. For him technical needs were inseparable from philosophical ones. It seems likely that he saw his music at this time as initiating a new incarnation analogous to that required of the 'chosen one' in the second part of Die Jakobsleiter. In the second turn of the spiral of his musical existence his task was evidently to reinterpret, in accordance with the 'higher and better order' to which he aspired, not his own previous experience, but the course of musical history as he knew and understood it best. His real interest began with Bach. He later declared his teachers to have been in the first place Bach and Mozart, and in the second Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms. Although the last two had appeared as the dominant influences in his tonal music, at least on the surface, the earlier ones now came to the fore. Despite the reluctance of the 'chosen one', like Moses after him, to return to the world and prophesy, Schoenberg was able to write to Hauer in December 1923 that after a 15-year search he had discovered a method of composition that allowed him to compose with a freedom and fantasy such as he had only known in his youth. The next 13 years were remarkably fruitful.

Most of the movements in the Serenade and the Suite draw on late Baroque dance characteristics much as Pierrot lunaire had borrowed from the subjects that it parodied. But although the detail of the Serenade often recalls Pierrot, as does its humour, six of its seven movements are built on an altogether larger scale, even without the lengthy repeats that Schoenberg adopted from his models. The repeats, here and in the Suite, are the first of any size and almost the last in the whole of his published work. They set him the special problem of canalizing his transforming imagination sufficiently within a given mood and character for a repetition to make sense. The exercise was no doubt an essential step towards establishing strongly differentiated developing characters in the great instrumental and operatic structures of the coming years. But that was incidental: Schoenberg said that he never knew what lay ahead, and his zigzag course towards the crises of 1908 and 1920 bears him out. There is nothing merely preparatory about the early serial masterpieces: his concern was, as ever, with the unique work in hand.

Thus in the marvellous series of instrumental works composed between 1920 and 1936 individuality is not of the limited kind associated with stepping-stones in a stylistic or technical evolution. In each one vigorous expansion within the terms of a particular premise builds a self-sufficient statement of very wide range, yet entirely singular. The next two works, the Wind Quintet and the Suite op.29 for seven instruments, illustrate the point very clearly. Schoenberg turned here to the thematic contrast required by Classical forms and to the traditional four-movement pattern. The first movement of the Quintet follows standard sonata layout, and the finale is a rondo. The first movement of the Suite lacks a regular development section, but despite the dance character of the second and fourth movements consistent symphonic treatment allies it with the Quintet rather than the Serenade. Yet the two works differ radically. The persistent contrapuntal texture of the Quintet looks back to the First String Quartet and the Kammersymphonie no.1 (and the emphasis on whole-tone and quartal sonorities is reminiscent of the latter work); the Suite is rooted in a harmonic idea which pervades texture and melody throughout. The divergence affects the music at every level.

In the Variationen für Orchester (1926–8) and the Third String Quartet (1927), which are also modelled on Classical forms, Schoenberg avoided these contrapuntal and harmonic extremes for the most part, and finally established the main stylistic characteristics of his serial music; these were to remain fairly constant to the end of his life. The transformations of the series as such cannot, of course, be followed consistently by the ear, and he strongly deprecated any attempt to do so. Although for him the series functioned in the manner of a motif, his themes consist primarily of rhythmic patterns which may carry any serial derivation. The thematic rhythms themselves are not fixed: he showed remarkable skill in varying them without endangering their identity. The interplay of melodic and rhythmic motif is responsible to a very large extent for the extraordinary richness of the music, bringing about in the course of a work the gradual accumulation of a mass of affinities between disparate elements. It also affects the bar-to-bar texture in an important way. The prodigious contrapuntal combinations so typical of the tonal works lose ground to relatively simple textures in which one or two salient lines predominate. But the rhythmic articulation of accompaniments fashioned out of serial forms in balanced succession or combination produces a wealth of motivic reference, as well as the play of rhythmic wit that is such a notable feature of Schoenberg's later scores. Thus the superimposition of ideas, with its accompanying risk of overloading, gives way to a finely graduated perspective in which listeners discover with increasing familiarity ever more layers of meaning beyond the clearcut foreground, as their hearing travels towards the inaudible vanishing-point of ultimate serial connection.

At the end of 1928 Schoenberg drafted the first version of the text of Moses und Aron (in the form of an oratorio) and composed the one-act comic opera Von heute auf morgen. The subjects of both works had been anticipated three years earlier in the two sets of short choral pieces opp.27 and 28. Most of these make considerable use of strict canonic or fugal writing, a feature that is taken up on a greatly expanded scale in the ensembles and choruses of the operas. The Drei Satiren op.28 deride the irresponsibility of modish modernity in music (especially Stravinsky's neo-classicism); Von heute auf morgen attacks the same thing in life. This is a comedy of marital strife and reconciliation involving a symmetrical quartet of characters: a wife brings her husband to heel when he takes an interest in an emancipated 'woman of today' by showing that she could play the same game if she wished. The little incident, which Gertrud Schoenberg with her husband's assistance turned into a very serviceable libretto, was suggested by the domestic life of the Greissles, according to documents among the Greissle papers, although the librettist told Leopoldina Gerhard that the Schrekers were the model. The text makes its points bluntly, like most that Schoenberg had a hand in or wrote himself: his musical style is not primarily illustrative and prefers a simple basis for the wealth of comment and interpretation that it provides in its own terms. The opera adopts Classical procedures, but handles them rather freely. Recitative and arioso break into the set pieces, expanding them to accommodate great flexibility of pace and feeling as the bickering characters waver between good sense and self-indulgence. Schoenberg finds no broad comedy in the commonplace and absurd situations, but endless nuances of humour and sentiment which, no less than the extremes of spirituality and depravity in Moses und Aron, relate to perennial components in his expressive range.

It was another 18 months before Schoenberg finally began to compose Moses und Aron. In the meantime he produced several smaller works in which the relation to Classical form becomes looser. The first piano piece of op.33 and its slightly later companion (1931) each employ a pair of contrasting themes, but the first, at least, recalls the concentrated manner of op.23. At this time he became interested in the problem of film music. Unwilling to subordinate his music to the requirements of a real film he chose instead to illustrate in his Begleitungsmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene an imaginary and unfilmable sequence of emotions: threatening danger, fear, catastrophe. He employed a kind of free variation form, and thinned out his recent style considerably to suit the programmatic nature of the undertaking. Since 1916 Schoenberg had now and then used tonality in fragmentary sketches and occasional pieces (notably the beautiful Weihnachtsmusik of 1921 based on Es ist ein' Ros' entsprungen), but never in published works. In 1929, however, he made some folksong settings for a commission, and followed them up with two non-dodecaphonic male choruses, Glück and Verbundenheit, the second of which centres on D minor. Although the other four choruses that make up op.35 are dodecaphonic, the exceptions show that the urge to return to tonal composition was beginning to gain ground.

Moses und Aron, composed between 1930 and 1932, is Schoenberg's second great profession of faith, a sequel to Die Jakobsleiter dealing with the predicament of the chosen one in carrying out his prophetic task. Unlike the oratorio, however, the work is in no real sense unfinished, even though the short third act was never set to music. The reason for this lies in the subject itself. At the beginning of Act 1 God, speaking from the burning bush, assigns to Moses the role of prophet. Schoenberg had summed up the problems of revelation without distortion in the second chorus from op.27: 'You shall not make an image. For an image confines, limits, grasps what should remain limitless and unimaginable. An image demands a name which you can take only from what is little. You shall not worship the little! You must believe in the spirit, directly, without emotion, selflessly'. Moses complains that he lacks eloquence to express what he understands of God, who accordingly appoints Aaron as his spokesman. Aaron comes to meet Moses; he echoes Moses's thoughts in less uncompromising terms, and this is underlined by the casting of Moses as a speaker and Aaron as a lyric tenor. They return together to bring the demoralized but expectant Israelites news of the new god who is to deliver them from Egyptian bondage. Moses tells them flatly that the one almighty, invisible and unimaginable God requires no sacrifices of them but complete devotion, and meets with a derision that Aaron can quell only by performing a series of three miracles, thereby substituting an image for the truth.

In Act 2 Aaron is obliged to still the people's doubt when Moses is away praying on the mountain by setting up a real image for them to worship in the form of the golden calf. The healing benefits of a faith so shallowly grounded are soon swept away by an orgy culminating in human sacrifice, suicide, lust and wholesale destruction. When Moses returns the calf vanishes at his word, but Aaron is able to defend his actions by pointing out that he is Moses's interpreter, and not an independent agent. The people are seen following yet another image, this time the pillar of fire, and Moses is left in despair. The uncomposed third act consists of another exchange between the brothers. This time Moses prevails. Aaron, who has been under arrest, is freed but falls dead; with all barriers to spiritual understanding removed the people will at length achieve unity with God. Schoenberg once suggested that Beethoven, Bruckner and Mahler had not been permitted to compose tenth symphonies because they might have revealed something that we are not permitted to know; a ninth seemed to represent a limit beyond which the composer must pass into the hereafter. To have composed music adequate to the idea of unity with God would have been to write a tenth symphony. At some level Schoenberg must have felt this from the outset, for the first two acts of the opera are dramatically and musically complete in themselves. But to remain true to his mission he could not admit that: it was his duty to continue to strive towards the expression of the inexpressible. To the end of his life he still spoke of finishing the work.

9. Autograph MS of the opening of Schoenberg's Klavierstück op.33a, composed December 1928 – April 1929 (private collection)

In its formal procedures Moses und Aron follows Von heute auf morgen in striking a balance between Classical number opera and Wagner's continuous symphonic manner, but on a far larger scale incorporating very big choral or orchestral movements. Schoenberg draws on every aspect of his music of the previous decade, and in the partly spoken texture of much of the choral writing looks back further. It is in every way his most comprehensive masterpiece, encompassing the stillness of the purely spiritual glimpsed momentarily in the opening bars, Moses's bitterness and resignation, Aaron's ecstatic eloquence and occasional weakness, and the people's jubilation, instability, mockery, violence and outright savagery. And it is noteworthy that the music interprets the stern morality of the libretto with a breadth of sympathy lacking in the neutral words.

That Schoenberg should now have sought relaxation in a less monumental task is not so surprising as his choice, which took the form of a pair of concertos for cello and for string quartet, based respectively on a keyboard concerto by M.G. Monn for which he had provided a continuo part some 20 years earlier, and Handel's Concerto grosso op.6 no.7 (the only one of the set that lacks separate concertino parts throughout). These works are often mistakenly classified as arrangements. However, whereas in his orchestrations of Bach and Brahms Schoenberg added nothing substantial to the original and never overstepped the style, the concertos are new compositions to almost the same degree as a set of variations on another composer's theme. Thus in each movement of the Cello Concerto he overlaid Monn's exposition with additional counterpoints and harmonies reaching as far forward as Brahms, or even later, and then continued independently in the same style. In the Quartet Concerto he preserved the complete outline of the original first movement and scarcely changed the second; on the other hand he radically recomposed the two remaining movements, taking only a few phrases from Handel in the third. In 1934 he crowned this group of works with a Suite in G for string orchestra in a similar style but based entirely on his own material. By way of indicating their secondary status he did not confer an opus number on any of them, yet they are brilliant compositions that he could certainly not have written earlier. The pressures towards the dissolution of tonality that haunt his older tonal works are entirely absent; the late works accept their terms of reference, and the clarity with which their abundant invention is projected derives directly from the serial works of the previous decade.

The one aspect of Schoenberg's serial music for which Moses und Aron had given only restricted opportunity was its abstract symphonic thought. This now became his chief concern again. After his tonal excursion he composed in 1935–6 the Violin Concerto and the Fourth String Quartet, his first 12-note works (apart from the three songs of op.48) since the opera, and with it the culminating productions of this period of his work. They are cast in the respective three- and four-movement moulds traditional in such works, but the individual movements abandon strict Classical layout. The first-movement recapitulations no longer correspond to the measure of the expositions, but are engulfed in the development, which continues unchecked to the close. The forward urge that marks all Schoenberg's music asserts itself so forcefully here that a return to single-movement structure through the breakdown of the divisions between movements might have been foretold. Such a return did indeed take place, but the transition was not a straightforward one.

8. Later works. Schoenberg's music was once again reaching a turning-point, even if a less acute one than in 1908 or 1920. Since the latter date his progressive reinterpretation of earlier musical principles had led him from Baroque and Classical models to a more fluid formal approach analogous to that of the later 19th century. The next step could only bring him to his own work – not merely to single-movement form but beyond that to the achievement of his expressionist years. But this very achievement was to a considerable degree the basis for his reinterpretation. As though to understand his situation better he took up, in 1939, the sketches for the Kammersymphonie no.2, begun in 1906 on the threshold of the crisis that now, though in a different way, confronted him for the second time. He completed the work in two movements, adding the last 20 bars of the first and about half of the second (from bar 309), but he also rescored and revised the remainder. In the process he increased the emphasis on a technical trait already prominent in the contemporary songs of opp.12 and 14. Whereas the harmony of the first Kammersymphonie had been characterized by an abundance of complex suspensions and appoggiaturas, that of the second tends to progress by stepwise movement in all parts. Schoenberg combined this technique with frequent 4th chords and similar combinations to very austere effect; indeed, the final coda strikes an unequivocally tragic note such as his later style would scarcely have countenanced. Perhaps recognition of this possibility in the material was an additional reason for his returning to it at this difficult period of his life.

In the previous year he had composed a setting of the Kol nidre in a tonal style which he hoped would prove acceptable in the synagogue. However, the work was found unsuitable for liturgical use because he had added an introduction and altered the traditional text in an attempt to strengthen its spiritual content. In order to give the main declaration of repentance and dedication 'the dignity of law', in his own phrase, he set it in march-like fashion and reinforced the effect with a harmonic severity that anticipates, in simpler terms, that of the Kammersymphonie no.2. After finishing the latter work he still felt that his harmonic style just before his first pantonal works offered unused possibilities. He set about exploring them further in the D minor Variations on a Recitative for organ. Here, as in several pieces of the earlier time, harmonic complexity is controlled by unremitting reference to the tonic; there are also, however, serial features. In many ways this work and the next, the setting of Byron's Ode to Napoleon, form a complementary pair of opposites. Each is rooted in a special harmonic procedure that gives it a peculiarly individual sound. The D minor work borrows from serialism; the dodecaphonic Ode ends in E♭. The Variations respect the integrity of their melodic theme; the series of the Ode is freely permuted. The sequence of extraordinarily heterogeneous works starting with the Kol nidre, each employing a different technique for a particular end, shows the composer once again moving as though inadvertently towards a definite point, in this case the resumption of serial composition from a rather different angle.

The Piano Concerto of 1942 consists of one movement, less a conflation of several movements like the First Quartet and Kammersymphonie no.1 than an expansion of a single sonata movement to embrace four symphonic characters in traditional sequence. As in the serial works up to 1936 all essential elements derive from the unpermuted series, but there are also strong affinities with the Ode to Napoleon. In the first place the music shares to some extent the quasi-tonal leanings of the Ode. This leads to more stable textures than are common in the earlier serial works, let alone the expressionist ones, and to symmetrical formal schemes, at least in outline. None of this suggests that Schoenberg was more closely engaged with the crisis of 1908 than he had been in 1936 – rather the reverse. But another legacy from the Ode changes the picture. At the very opening the serial melody is supported by free permutations of itself, its unusual tonal stability achieved through an unstable element. The consequences emerge later: chaos lies in wait at transitional points, above all at the end of each of the middle sections, where the chromatic totality becomes an undifferentiated stack of 4ths which momentarily endanger the work's identity. The abyss had opened before in Schoenberg's music, for instance in Erwartung, but never beneath so serene a surface. The effect is correspondingly disturbing.

The following year at the request of his publishers he composed a set of variations in G minor for band. It was intended for wide circulation and so couched in a straightforward tonal idiom, like the G major Suite for strings, which had been written for college orchestras. It has all the vigour and ebullience of the earlier work, and as there his personality marks every bar no less firmly than in his more dissonant style. After this he wrote nothing for two years owing to deterioration in his health. When he resumed composing approximately one work a year, as he had done fairly regularly since his arrival in America, his bad eyesight obliged him to restrict his scale of activity. He wrote the first work of this last group in response to another commission. He was asked to compose the prelude to a suite for chorus and orchestra by various composers based on selections from the book of Genesis. Schoenberg evidently thought of God as creating the world out of divine order rather than primordial chaos, for the core of his compact piece consists of an eight-part double canon followed by two strettos that draw into their orbit the more amorphous elements from the opening. In the works of this last phase (except, of course, the folksong settings op.49), the tonal influence that had still been perceptible in the Piano Concerto recedes, and the language moves somewhat closer to that of the serial works up to 1936.

The longest and most wide-ranging of these late works is the String Trio of 1946. It is cast in a single movement expanded from within by the pressure of continuous and multifarious development. The different musical characters do not group themselves into clear subsidiary sections, as in the Piano Concerto, but alternate with a degree and frequency of contrast that Schoenberg had avoided since his expressionist period. Indeed, with this work he finally overtook his own earlier achievement and absorbed it into his later mode of thought. He divided the score into three 'parts' separated by two 'episodes' of different serial construction. The first part and episode correspond to an exposition, and the second part and episode to a development; the third part contains a truncated but unusually exact recapitulation and a coda. The structure recalls the first movement of the Fourth Quartet in the return early in the development to the codetta of the exposition, before the emergence of an important new melody.

The outpouring of elusive, visionary music held within this framework arose directly from the special circumstances of composition: Schoenberg had just recovered from an almost fatal heart attack, and he confessed that the experience was reflected in the Trio. It is not difficult to guess the direction of his thoughts. Having stood nearer than ever before to the truths that lay beyond man's reach in this world he was under the obligation to reveal what he could. The reinterpretation of expressionism towards which he had been moving suddenly took on a new urgency. Just as, nearly 40 years before, the attempt to lift all constraints from intuition had led to him placing his art in the service of faith, and eventually to a new order in composition, so he might now, from his present level, reach further still. But if the work contains intimations of the hereafter it is also concerned with this world: the melody heard in the second part and again in the coda recalls the music for the woman healed by faith, even though faith in an image, in Act 2 of Moses und Aron, and would seem to refer to his precarious recovery. There can be little doubt that the work was intended as a personal and spiritual testament, and it could have closed his life-work worthily.

In the event Schoenberg lived another five years and was able to compose a second testament in 1950. His first work in the interim, A Survivor from Warsaw, was wrung from him by a report of an occasion when Jews on their way to the gas chamber found courage in singing the Shema Yisrael, the command to love God, who is one lord. Though a short piece it made large demands. The orchestral accompaniment to the witness's spoken narration illustrates a reality more horrible than anything that Schoenberg could have imagined when he wrote his Begleitungsmusik, and his original melody for the Hebrew cantillation is an extraordinary conception, expressing a desperate tenacity that belongs very much to its author. The three folksongs op.49 are new settings of tunes that he had already arranged in 1929. The two choral settings of Es gingen zwei Gespielen gut, the most elaborate in their respective sets, show a revealing shift of emphasis: the 1929 version takes the form of a complex set of canonic variations, that of 1948 is less intricate but allows the original melody to dissolve in the general texture of variation. Schoenberg's last instrumental work is entitled 'Phantasy for violin with piano accompaniment'. The description is exact: the violin part leads throughout, having even been written separately before the accompaniment. Melody accordingly dominates, limiting a tendency towards the sharp contrasts characteristic of the String Trio and checking their more disruptive consequences. This is the key to the work's special quality. It stands close to the Trio in many points of style, including melodic style, and in its subtlety of thematic continuity, but finds more consistent tranquillity.

The three religious choruses for mixed voices of op.50 were conceived at different times for different purposes and have little in common. However, at a time when he still hoped to finish the last one Schoenberg looked forward to their performance as a group. Dreimal tausend Jahre is a four-part setting of a short poem looking forward to God's return among the faithful in the new Israel. The close-knit textures and full harmony ally it to the male choruses op.35, whereas the mixture of singing and speech in the more dramatic six-part De profundis recalls Moses und Aron and throws into relief the varied soloistic phrases expressing repentance and supplication. The third, unfinished piece employs a speaker and an orchestra with the chorus. The text is a meditation on prayer by the composer himself, the first of the series of 'modern psalms' that occupied the last months of his life. Towards the end it speaks of the feeling of unity with God experienced in prayer. The passage is first given to the speaker, and should then have been taken up by the chorus. But at this point the composition breaks off, for it presented Schoenberg with the same task, at once impossible to fulfil yet central to his beliefs, as the third act of Moses und Aron: that of revealing through his music what it is not given to man to know. Although he still entertained the notion of working on Die Jakobsleiter and Moses until shortly before his death he must really have known that it was out of the question, and that the withdrawal into silence manifested in his psalm represented his final testament.

Since the time of his death Schoenberg's cardinal importance as an innovator has been very widely recognized. As a result most of his works are now assured of at least an occasional hearing. Yet although his idiom is no longer unfamiliar in a general sense, his music remains less easily accessible than that of his eminent pupils and contemporaries. One difficulty has been that musicians who shared his background and artistic assumptions, and might in principle have built up a tradition of performance – men such as Furtwängler, Walter, Kleiber and Klemperer, all of whom worked in Berlin when Schoenberg was there – failed to keep abreast of his development, while the more objective, uncommitted approach cultivated in the postwar years overlooked too much. But if the scarcity of good performances has not helped to dispel the wider public's indifference, neither does it entirely account for it. There would appear to be more fundamental causes that affect specialist audiences as well.

In 1930 Berg drew attention to the close parallel between Schoenberg's historical position and that of Bach ('Credo', Die Musik, xxii, 1929–30, pp.264–5). He showed that a few small changes could make the assessment of the latter in Riemann's encyclopedia apply equally well to Schoenberg, who, like Bach, lived at a time of transition between two musical styles and succeeded in reconciling their opposing characteristics through his genius. Berg did not live to see his comparison further borne out by changes in taste after his teacher's death. Just as Bach's music held no interest for a generation preoccupied with the simpler language of early symphonic music, so the greater part of Schoenberg's work has had limited appeal for ears attuned to the broader effects of new sound resources and aleatory procedures or, more recently, to minimalism and postmodernist eclecticism. Its Bach-like density, proliferation and order run counter to the spirit of the age, making exceptional demands on the interpretative discipline of the performer and the sensibility of the listener. In the long run, however, these very qualities are likely to tell no less powerfully in its favour. Perhaps no other composer of the time has so much to offer.

WORKS

Edition: A. Schoenberg: Sämtliche Werke (Mainz, 1966–) [S]

Only a selection of the more considerable of Schoenberg's numerous unfinished compositions is included here. Many more are listed in Rufer (1959), and those up to 1933 are catalogued in greater detail in Maegaard, i (1972). Some fragments are published in Maegaard, iii (1972) [M]; all will eventually be included in S. Works without opus numbers are unpublished unless otherwise stated. For more precise details of composition dates see Rufer (1959), Maegaard (1972) and S.
